One daughter ... ..	£	100
Total	£	400

The widow and one daughter of the late Mr. F. Skipwith (annuitant of 1857). The date of death cannot be stated in this instance, as the Agents of the Fund, who reported the occurrence by telegram, have omitted to furnish the date.

Admission has been granted with effect from the day after death.

3. Mr. A. Christie has incurred the penalty prescribed in Article XXXVII of the Rules by having neglected for more than one year to pay the necessary subscriptions to the Fund on his furlough allowance. Mr. Christie urges forgetfulness as his plea for the omission. As Mr. Christie has now paid up all arrears of subscription together with 8 per cent interest as required by the Rules, the Managers recommend his case to the favourable consideration of the meeting.

4. The votes of the Subscribers on the Resolution passed at the last General Meeting for the amendment of Article III of the Rules have been scrutinized with the following result:—

Amendment of Article III	For.	Against.
5. In accordance with Article XXII of the Revised Rules, the Managers have to report that Mr. H. J. S. Cotton having obtained eight months' leave of absence tendered his resignation as an elected Manager, and that Mr. J. Munro was invited to join the Board of Managers in succession to Mr. Cotton.	122	1

6. The Managers will propose the following addition to, and amendment of, the rules:—

ARTICLE XXIX.

(a.)—In the second proviso for the words “continue the whole or any part of his pension,” substitute the word “grant.”

(b.)—In the same proviso, after the word “livelihood” insert “a pension not exceeding that to which he would be entitled if he had not passed the age of 21 years.”

7. As regards the questions pending between the Secretary of State and the Civil Fund it will be remembered that the Secretary of State's decision on the question of the limit of the eight per cent fund, and his offer to take over the Fund were communicated in his despatch No. 16, dated 22nd December 1881. His calculations were based on a valuation of the Fund made by General Hannington for the date April 1st, 1875; and with his despatch he communicated General Hannington's report and a criticism of it by Mr. W. Sutton, the same Actuary who made for the Managers the valuations of 1878. The measure of benefits which he estimated that the Fund, on the conditions allowed by himself, could afford, and which he offered for the future to grant from it, was the unextended scale of the period before 1878, plus twenty-two lakhs worth (that is, two-thirds or three quarters) of the extensions made by the Fund with effect from 1878. The Managers replied on April 5th, 1882, comparing the hard terms which the Secretary of State desired to impose on the Bengal Fund with the great liberality shewn to Madras and Bombay, and claiming a concession in some remote degree approaching to that made to the last two Funds in accepting their status quo up to 1875. The Secretary of State answers in a despatch No. 12, dated 9th November 1882 (of which we have received a few paragraphs only) in which he admits that Bengal has received less assistance than Madras or Bombay, but denies any claim on our part to obtain equal terms now. He, however, so far advances the terms he offers as to consent not only to twenty-two lakhs worth, but to the whole of the extensions of benefits we made in 1880 (except Annuitant's “ordinary” subscriptions); but he considers that in doing so he is offering to take over a deficit of nine lakhs of rupees.

The Managers attach copy of that part of the despatch last quoted which they have received from the Government of India and also copy of the reply which they made to the Government upon the 20th March last.

Meantime Mr. Westland undertook a critical examination* of the valuations upon which the Secretary of State's case was based, and the conclusion he reaches is that the Fund is in a better position than the Secretary of State assumes, and that so far from there being a deficit of nine lakhs of rupees the assets of the Fund “even under the conditions imposed by the Secretary of State are quite equal to meeting all its liabilities, and it is upon this basis alone that any negotiations for its transfer to Government should be entered upon.” The Managers have the matter still under consideration.

Proposed by Mr. Stevens, seconded by Mr. Pargiter, and carried unanimously—

That the Managers' proceedings in admitting the families of the late Messrs. T. Taylor, J. M. Pears, A. Lang, A. W. Cochran, H. M. Tobin, Geo. Loch, P. D. Dickens, and H. C. T. Robinson, the Hon'ble R. Forbes, and Mr. F. Skipwith to the benefits of the Fund be confirmed.

Proposed by Mr. Wilkins, and seconded by Mr. Stevens, and carried unanimously, that Mr. A. Christie be restored to the full rights of a subscriber.

* Mr. Westland's report has been printed and is available to any subscriber who may write to the Secretary for a copy.

With reference to the proposed amendment of Article XXIX of the rules, Mr. Westland explained that the object of the alteration was merely to clear up an ambiguity in the wording of the article, and to enable the Managers to give effect to its real intention. Strictly speaking, the proviso which it was proposed to amend limited the power of the Managers to the continuance of the whole or a part of pension which an incumbent had drawn before he reached his majority. The rule, therefore, as it at present stood, did not allow the increase of the pension from £100 to £150, if the son became motherless after he was 21 years of age; whereas the limit would be £150, if the son had become motherless before attaining 21 years. Moreover, the practice of the Managers was to grant these pensions for a limited time only, so that the grant came up for reconsideration after the expiry of short periods. The Managers considered this practice a desirable one, on many grounds, and considered it advisable that the wording of the rule should more clearly cover it.

Proposed by the Hon'ble W. F. McDonell, seconded by Mr. Westland, and carried unanimously—

That the amendment to Article XXIX of the rules be confirmed, subject to the necessary sanction of the service.

The Chairman then read to the meeting paragraph 7 of the Managers' report, on which considerable discussion took place, and it was ultimately proposed by Mr. Charles, seconded by Mr. Wilkins, and carried unanimously—

“That the Managers be desired to take into early consideration the propriety of relieving annuitants of all their subscriptions according to pledges previously given by subscribers.”

After a vote of thanks to the Chair the meeting dissolved.

PROMOTIONS.

No. 473.—COLONEL'S ALLOWANCE—

In continuation of G. G. O. No. 489 of 1881, paragraph 8, and under the orders of the Secretary of State for India, His Excellency the Governor General in Council notifies that the following arrangements will take effect with respect to the numbers of Colonel's allowances to be allotted to Classes III and IV therein referred to, viz., officers of the General Lists, and those who entered the several Staff Corps after the 12th September, 1866, and before the 1st July, 1881, respectively.

2. For the purpose of regulating the succession to the Colonel's allowance, officers of the General Lists of Cavalry and Infantry of the three presidencies will be placed on an amalgamated list according to seniority.

3. The numbers of the General List officers forming Class III, excluding those who have joined the Staff Corps, line regiments, and new line regiments, stood as follows on the 14th March, 1862:—

Madras	...	...	...	...	108
Bombay	...	...	...	...	68

and calculated in the proportion of 1 in 30 officers, with an allowance of one in addition when the remainder exceeds ten, the fixed establishment of Colonel's allowances for the amalgamated list of officers of Class III will be 13.

4. As soon as the senior of these officers then remaining on the amalgamated list completes 12 years' service as substantive Lieutenant-Colonel, he will succeed to the Colonel's allowance; the next to him will succeed likewise on the same condition, and so on, until the 13 seniors then remaining in the service attain to the Colonel's allowance. Thereafter the fixed number of 13 Colonel's allowances will be maintained, the officers succeeding to vacancies occurring therein in order of seniority without reference to qualifying service, so long as there are any of the officers of the General Lists remaining.

5. For the officers of Class IV, viz., officers who entered the Staff Corps after the 12th September, 1866, and before the 1st July, 1881, there will be a separate list of officers of this class for each presidency, arranged according to seniority by substantive rank. The numbers of these officers as they stood on the 30th June, 1881 were—

Madras	...	...	...	...	175
Bombay	...	...	...	...	207

and calculating by the rule above mentioned, the number of Colonel's allowances for the officers of Class IV of the three presidencies, respectively, will be :—

Bengal	...	...	...	...	20
Madras	...	...	...	...	6
Bombay	...	...	...	...	7

6. When the senior of each separate list has completed 12 years' service as substantive Lieutenant-Colonel, he will succeed to the Colonel's allowance on the list to which he belongs, and the next to him in succession in the same way, until the above establishment of Colonel's allowances fixed for each list, respectively, is complete. Thenceforward these numbers of Colonel's allowances will be maintained so long as any officers belonging to Class IV remain in the Bengal, Madras, or Bombay army, vacancies in each list being filled by the seniors without reference to qualifying service.

Preliminary.

1. (1) This Act may be called the British Burma Pilots Act, 1883.

Short title.

- (2) It extends to the territories for the time being administered by the Chief Commissioner of British Burma; and Local extent.

- (3) It shall come into force on such date as the Chief Commissioner may fix in this behalf.

Commencement.

2. In this Act—

"Port" means any port, or any part of a navigable river or channel, in which the Indian Ports Act, XII of 1875, is for the time being in force.

Licensing of Pilots.

3. The Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, appoint, or cause to be appointed, competent persons for the purpose of examining the qualifications of persons desirous of acting as pilots at any port, and make rules—

- (a) for the conduct of the examinations and for the qualifications to be required;
- (b) establishing grades of pilots, and determining the duties which may be undertaken by pilots of each grade;
- (c) for the grant to qualified persons of licenses to act as pilots of any grade at any port; and
- (d) for the fees to be paid for the examinations and licenses.

4. (1) A person shall not act as a pilot at any port, after such date as the Chief Commissioner may fix in this behalf for that port, except as permitted by a license granted under section 3.

(2) Any person acting as a pilot in contravention of this section shall be punished, for every time he so acts, with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

Regulation of Pilots.

5. (1) The Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, by notification in the British Burma Gazette, make rules to regulate the conduct of pilots licensed under this Act in all matters connected with the performance of their duties as such pilots.

(2) Any such rule may contain a provision that a pilot committing a breach of the rule shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both:

Provided that a prosecution shall not be instituted in respect of any such breach except by order of such officer as the Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, appoint in this behalf.

Special Court.

6. (1) If the Chief Commissioner has reason to believe that there are grounds for charging any pilot licensed under this Act with incompetency or misconduct in the discharge of his duties as such pilot, or with any act or omission in breach of a rule made under section 5, and that the charge cannot be satisfactorily investigated by an ordinary Court, he may direct that a special Court be constituted, under this Act, at the port at which it will, in his opinion, be most convenient for the parties and witnesses to attend, and shall then send to the Court a statement of the grounds of the charge, and direct the Court to make an investigation into the charge.

(2) When the Chief Commissioner directs an investigation under this section, he may, if he thinks fit, appoint a person to act as prosecutor in the investigation.

7. Every Court constituted under section 6 shall consist of a president sitting with three assessors.

8. (1) The president shall be such person as the Chief Commissioner appoints in this behalf, either generally or for any specified case.

(2) Every person so appointed shall be deemed to be a public servant within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code. X

9. One of the assessors shall be a master of a seagoing vessel lying in the port at which the investigation is to be made, another shall be a merchant residing at that port, and the third shall be a person who has personally exercised the calling of a pilot for not less than five years.

10. (1) The assessor who is the master of a seagoing vessel shall be appointed in each case by the Chief Commissioner, and shall be summoned by the president.

(2) The other assessors shall be summoned by the president in such manner as may be prescribed by rule, out of two lists, one of merchants, the other of pilots, to be, from time to time, prepared for the purpose and published by the Chief Commissioner in the British Burma Gazette. If there are no such lists, or if it is impracticable to procure the attendance of two persons one of whom is named in the list of merchants and the other in list of pilots, the other assessors or assessor, as the case may be, shall be appointed and summoned by the president.

11. The assessors shall receive such fees as the Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, by rule, prescribe.

12. Before any investigation under this Act is commenced, the special Court shall supply the pilot with a copy of the statement sent, under section 6, to the Court.

13. For the purpose of an investigation under this Act, the special Court may summon the pilot to appear before it, and shall give him full opportunity of making a defence, either in person or otherwise.

14. For the purpose of an investigation under this Act, the special Court shall, so far as relates to compelling the attendance, and to the examination, of witnesses, the production of documents and the regulation of the proceedings, have the same powers as are exercisable by the principal Court of original criminal jurisdiction for the place at which the investigation is made.

15. On the completion of the investigation, the special Court shall send to the Chief Commissioner a full report of the conclusions at which it has arrived. The report shall be in accordance with the opinion of the majority of the members of the Court, or, if the Court is equally divided, in accordance with the opinion of the president and with the member with whom he concurs. In the latter case, any member who does not concur in the report may separately record his opinion.

16. (1) The Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, make rules to carry into effect the provisions of this Act with respect to the special Court, and in particular with respect to—

Power of Chief Commissioner to make rules.

- (a) the mode in which the president shall, under section 10, summon the assessors;
- (b) the amount of the fees to be paid to the assessors; and
- (c) the procedure of the Court.

(2) All such rules shall be published in the British Burma Gazette, and shall thereupon have the force of law.

Power to cancel, suspend or reduce Licenses.

17. The Chief Commissioner may cancel or suspend, or reduce the grade of, any license granted to a pilot under this Act in the following cases, that is to say:—

Power to cancel, suspend or reduce license for misconduct, &c.

- (a) if the pilot is found guilty by a Criminal Court of any offence punishable under section 5, or of any other offence the commission of which, in the opinion of the Chief Commissioner, shows him to be unfit to discharge the duties of a pilot; or

(b) if, on considering a report submitted under section 15 of this Act, or transmitted under section 17 of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, the Chief Commissioner is of opinion that the pilot is incompetent, or has been guilty of any misconduct in the discharge of his duty as pilot, or of any breach of a rule made under section 5 of this Act.

V of 1883.

18. When a prosecution has been instituted against a pilot under section 5, or an investigation has been ordered in respect of him under section 6, or an investigation affecting his conduct has been ordered under Chapter II of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, the Chief Commissioner may suspend his license until the trial is concluded or the report of the investigation is submitted or transmitted to the Chief Commissioner, as the case may be.

Delegation of Functions of Chief Commissioner.

Power to delegate functions of Chief Commissioner.

REPORTS ON THE STATE OF THE SEASON AND PROSPECTS OF THE CROPS FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 28th AUGUST 1883.

GENERAL REMARKS.—The favourable change in the weather noticed last week has been maintained during the one under report. A fresh burst of the monsoon on the Western Ghats has brought good and opportune rain to the districts of the Konkan, Deccan, and Southern Mahratta Country. Parts of these tracts, however, continue in need of rain, and in Guzerat, where the fall was very slight, it is urgently needed. In Sind, according to latest reports, the river is 6 feet below last year's level, and the crops have suffered from scarcity of water. From Bombay the monsoon has extended to the Berars, Hyderabad, and Central India. In the former prospects are excellent, in the latter very much improved, and all cause for immediate anxiety is removed in most of the States. Rajputana is still for the most part without rain, and in many States much anxiety is felt as to crops and fodder.

In the Madras Presidency the weather continues favourable, although in Madura, Tanjore, and Coimbatore the unirrigated crops need more rain.

In British Burma the generally insufficient rainfall compared with the past year is beginning to affect the rice crop in the midland districts, but elsewhere prospects are good. Rain is also wanted in the Gauhati district of Assam. In the Cachar district lying to the south-east of Gauhati a heavy fall has again caused considerable damage. In Bengal the rainfall of the week has been generally good, and though more is required in places, prospects are good. In a few localities floods have done some damage. Good rain in the Central Provinces has greatly benefited the standing crops, which now offer hopes of a fair yield. Rice, though much retarded by the long break, is expected to return only a quarter below the average outturn if favourable weather continues. More rain is wanted in the Saugor, Damoh, and Jubbulpore districts. In North-Western Provinces and Oudh the rainfall of the week though fairly general has been insufficient and unequal. The eastern as well as the western districts are now in need of rain, and the kharif crops are being irrigated where possible. Rain continues to hold off in the Punjab, and the crops on unirrigated lands in the south-eastern districts are reported to be rapidly failing. The supply of grass and fodder is also running short.

Agricultural operations remain unchanged. Ploughing and sowing are nearly completed in Burma, and transplanting is well advanced. Rice and jute are being reaped in Bengal, and rice in Assam. Early kharif grains are coming into the market in Northern India. Harvesting is going on in Madras. Locusts are still reported from the Deccan.

Cholera is generally on the decrease, but would appear to be severe at present in Nagpur. Fever is spreading, and small-pox is reported in several districts. Cattle-disease in mild form continues generally prevalent.

Prices are for the most part stationary, except in Rajputana where they are rising.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

STEPS FOR GIVING GREATER PUBLICITY TO LEGISLATIVE MEASURES.

Nos. 1104-14, dated the 23rd August, 1883.

From—D. FITZPATRICK, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department,

To—Local Governments and Administrations.

I AM now directed to acknowledge your letter No. , dated and to communicate the further decision of the Government of India on certain points referred to in my Circular Nos. 1030-40, dated 9th September, 1882, on the subject of giving greater publicity to legislative measures.

2. The matters now remaining to be settled are the following :—

- (a) the publication of Bills, Statements of Objects and Reasons, Reports of Select Committees and Debates of the Legislative Council in a cheap form for sale and gratuitous distribution (paragraph 4 of the Circular) ;
- (b) the question of the steps to be taken for the sale and gratuitous distribution of such papers, both English and Vernacular copies (paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Circular) ;
- (c) the question of improving the translations of Bills and connected documents (paragraph 5 of the Circular) ;
- (d) the question of preparing an Urdu translation in the Legislative Department for general use (paragraph 6 of the Circular).

3. In regard to the first of these points, it has been arranged to print English copies of Bills and the other documents referred to on cheap paper and to sell them at the rate of three pies per sheet (of four pages) or part of a sheet, except in the case of papers running over sixty-four pages, which will be sold at a special price calculated at a rate decreasing as the number of pages increases. The whole set of papers published in a year will also be made available to annual subscribers at the rate of two rupees, exclusive of postage. The papers will be printed by the Superintendent of Government Printing at Calcutta or Simla, as the case may be, and the price of each collection to casual purchasers will be noted on each copy issued.

The copies printed in this style will also be supplied for gratuitous distribution.

4. In regard to the second point, namely, the steps to be taken for the sale and gratuitous distribution of these papers, I am to say that the Governor General in Council, having considered the proposals made by the several Local Governments, is content to leave the matter in their hands. I am accordingly to enquire what number of copies of the English reprints mentioned in paragraph 3 of this letter <sup>the Governor in Council</sup> His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor <sup>you</sup> would wish to be ordinarily supplied for sale and for gratuitous distribution (otherwise than to the Press) in the Madras Presidency

the Bombay Presidency
Bengal
the North-Western Provinces and Oudh
the Panjáb
the Central Provinces
British Burma
Ajmer-Merwára
Coorg
Assam
the Haidarâbad Assigned Districts

The distribution to the Press will be made by the Legislative Department of the Government of India, a copy of each collection of papers being forwarded to the Editor of each of the newspapers mentioned in the list forwarded with your letter No. , dated .

In connection with the supply of these papers to the Press, it is observed that in several of the communications received from local officers and private persons it is proposed that they should be supplied gratuitously to all newspapers without distinction. This, however, is, the Governor General in Council considers, more than could reasonably be expected. Ephemeral papers are constantly being started and dropping off, which can have no claim to consideration, and it will be sufficient to supply copies of legislative papers to those papers only which have succeeded in thoroughly establishing themselves. It will, of course, be understood that the selection of newspapers for this purpose will be in no sense a matter of favour, but will turn entirely on the importance of the paper. These principles should be borne in mind in making any additions to the list of newspapers in

the Madras Presidency	-----
the Bombay Presidency	-----
Bengal	-----
the North-Western Provinces and Oudh	-----
the Panjab	-----
the Central Provinces	-----
British Burma	-----
Cooch	-----
Assam	-----

which are to be supplied with copies.

5. Cheap reprints of translations of Bills and connected documents prepared under the orders of Local Governments should be published, made available for sale to the public and distributed gratuitously in the same manner as the English reprints above referred to, and I am to request that the necessary steps may be taken for effecting this in the Madras Presidency	-----

the Bombay Presidency	-----
Bengal	-----
the North-Western Provinces and Oudh	-----
the Panjab	-----
the Central Provinces	-----
British Burma	-----
Cooch	-----
Assam	-----
the Hyderabad Assigned Districts	-----

6. In connection with the supply of legislative papers to the public, I am directed to observe that it appears from some of the replies to the Circular of the 9th September, 1882, that local officers sometimes neglect to ascertain the opinions of the people around them on Bills which are forwarded to them. It was assumed in paragraph 2 of the previous Circular that District and Sub-divisional Officers were fully aware of the importance attached to this matter; and I am now to request that measures may be taken to prevent its falling out of sight.

7. I am also to state for <sup>the information of the Governor in Council</sup> ~~the information of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor~~ <sup>your information</sup> that, in order to give wide notice of the time at which Bills circulated for opinion will be taken up again, the date, where one is fixed, will be printed on the Bill itself.

8. In regard to the third point noted above, namely, the question of improving the translations of Bills and connected documents, it would appear from the replies to the Circular that while, as might be expected in the case of a matter of such difficulty, errors are from time to time detected and there is room for improvement, the work is on the whole fairly well done. The chief charge made against the translators is the unnecessary use by them of foreign words. It is probable that this charge is, to a certain extent, well-founded; but, on the other hand, it must be remembered that it is, as observed in several of the opinions received, impossible to translate such papers as Bills into certain Indian languages without borrowing to some extent from Persian, Arabic or Sanskrit,—sometimes the translator will find it best even to use English words and phrases. If such words and phrases are used in moderation and with discrimination, they would probably not be found to present any difficulty to persons sufficiently educated to read Bills, especially as the words and phrases so used must constantly recur and must accordingly soon become familiar, if they have not already become familiar, to persons of that class. The difficulty might, however, be effectually removed by appending an explanatory footnote, as has been suggested in some of the opinions received, whenever an unfamiliar word or phrase is unavoidably used in a translation ; and I am to request that this plan may be adopted in the translations prepared under <sup>the orders of the Governor in Council</sup> ~~the orders of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor~~ <sup>your orders</sup>.

It must not, however, be supposed that the Governor General in Council underrates the importance of having all translations expressed in the plainest and simplest language possible ; and I am to request that you will impress upon the translators in the necessity of avoiding the use of words and phrases, whether Persian, Arabic, Sanskrit or English, which are not in common use among the class of people for whose benefit the translations are made.

9. It is suggested in some of the opinions received that the translations of Bills should be free and not literal, but this suggestion does not commend itself to the Governor General in Council. No doubt, Bills of a technical character may not be easily understood by the majority even of educated people, and it is for this reason that it was proposed to make Statements of Objects and Reasons fuller and more explanatory ; but it is indispensable that whatever is published as a translation (as distinguished from an explanation) of a Bill should be a close and literal translation. A person attempting to make a free translation of a Bill would have to contend not only with the difficulties of a translator but also with those of a draftsman, and would run a very great risk of producing something differing from the original Bill in material particulars ; therefore, translations of Bills should be exact, but translations of Statements of Objects and Reasons, Reports of Select Committees and Debates in Council might with advantage be made free.

10. The translations prepared in this Department, to be presently referred to, will be made on the principles set forth in paragraphs 8 and 9 above.

11. As regards the local translating staffs, their organization must be left to the Local Governments ; but the Governor General in Council would observe that the translators should, when possible, be persons possessing a fair knowledge of law.

12. In regard to the fourth point noted in paragraph 2 above, I am to inform you that it has been determined, in accordance with the opinions received in answer to the former Circular, to issue Urdu or Hindustani translations of Bills, Statements of Objects and Reasons, Reports of Select Committees and Debates from this Department for general use, and also transliterated versions of the same in the Nāgrī character. Arrangements will be set on foot for preparing these translations and transliterations, and, meanwhile, I am to enquire how many copies of each would ordinarily be required for distribution and sale in

the Madras Presidency
the Bombay Presidency
Bengal
The North-Western Provinces and Oudh
the Panjab
the Central Provinces
British Burma
Coorg
Assam
the Hyderabad Assigned Districts

These translations and transliterations are, it is hardly necessary to say, not intended to supersede translations into any other languages which the Local Governments may find it necessary to issue.

13. Translations of Acts into Urdu or Hindustani, and transliterated versions in the Nāgrī character, will also be prepared in this Department, and I am to enquire how many copies of these would be required in

the Madras Presidency
the Bombay Presidency
Bengal
the North-Western Provinces and Oudh
the Panjab
the Central Provinces

ABSTRACT OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE COUNCIL OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA, ASSEMBLED FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING LAWS AND REGULATIONS UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF PARLIAMENT 24 & 25 VIC., CAP. 67.

The Council met at Government House, Simla, on Wednesday, the 29th August, 1883.

His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India, K.G., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., presiding.

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjáb, K.C.S.I., C.I.E.

The Hon'ble Sir S. C. Bayley, K.C.S.I., C.I.E.

BURMA PILOTS BILL.

The Hon'ble Mr. ILBERT moved that the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to provide for the grant of licenses to Pilots in British Burma and for investigating certain charges against them be taken into consideration. He said:—

“ My Lord, this Bill was introduced by the Hon'ble Mr. Whitley Stokes in March, 1882, and its main object, as explained by him, was to give the force of law to certain rules which, under existing circumstances, rest exclusively on the authority of executive orders. It provided amongst other things for constituting special Courts of Inquiry for investigating charges against pilots. When I took up the Bill I felt some doubts whether it had been drawn up on the most appropriate lines, and it appeared to me that some of its provisions were open to rather serious objections. For instance, every charge against a pilot, however simple, had to be sent for trial before an elaborately and expensively constituted Court, including in its number assessors drawn from various classes of experts. Now, a Court of this kind is probably necessary for investigating charges which cannot be properly investigated except by persons possessing nautical or other special knowledge; but it would be absurd to summon such a Court to consider whether a pilot was or was not drunk on some particular day. Again, the Bill covered part of the same ground which is occupied by the Merchant Shipping Acts, and Hon'ble Members will remember that our latest Merchant Shipping Act, which is modelled on a corresponding English Statute, provides for the holding of Courts of Inquiry to investigate shipping casualties, and enables those Courts to try charges preferred against masters, mates and engineers in connection with those casualties. The result would be that there might be sitting at the same time, at the same place, and in connection with the same casualty two separate and independent Courts—one constituted under the Merchant Shipping Act and investigating a charge against the master of a ship, and the other constituted under the Pilots Act and investigating a charge against the pilot. Furthermore, I could not help thinking that there was a good deal of force in the objection taken by two of the Burma pilots, namely, that the power given to the Chief Commissioner to dismiss, suspend and degrade was somewhat arbitrary. I agree with them in thinking that this power should not be exercised without some preliminary judicial investigation.

Lastly it seemed to me worth while enquiring whether any special Act was necessary for British Burma at all, and whether the objects of the Bill might not appropriately be met by an amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act and the Indian Ports Act. We referred this point to the maritime Local Governments, but were satisfied with the replies we received that whilst special legislation is necessary for British Burma, yet the difficulty which this Bill was intended to meet is either not likely to arise in other parts of British India, or could be more suitably dealt with under the provisions of the existing law.

"This being so, we determined to proceed with the Bill, but to amend it in such a way as to remove the objections to which I have referred. The Bill in its present form provides for the grant of licenses to pilots, and enables the Chief Commissioner to make rules regulating the conduct of licensed pilots. Breach of these rules is punishable by fine or imprisonment. If a pilot is charged with an offence of a simple nature, such as drunkenness or refusing to take charge of a ship, he goes before the ordinary Courts, and is dealt with in the ordinary way. If, on the other hand, the Local Government thinks there are grounds for charging him with incompetency or misconduct in the discharge of his duties as pilot, or with a breach of rules made under the Act, and that the charge is of such a nature that it cannot be satisfactorily investigated by an ordinary Court, provision is made for summoning a special Court with duly qualified assessors. This Court will submit their report to the Chief Commissioner, but will have no power to punish. With the Chief Commissioner will rest the power to dismiss, suspend or degrade a pilot in the following cases:—

(a) if the pilot is found guilty by a Criminal Court of any offence punishable under the rules, or of any other offence the commission of which, in the opinion of the Chief Commissioner, shows him to be unfit to discharge the duties of a pilot; or

(b) if, on considering a report submitted by a special Court under the Act, or transmitted under section 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, the Chief Commissioner is of opinion that the pilot is incompetent or has been guilty of any misconduct in the discharge of his duty as pilot or of any breach of a rule under section 5.

"It will be observed that it is proposed to empower the Chief Commissioner to act on the report of an investigation into a casualty under the Merchant Shipping Act, and I presume that, in cases in which the pilot has been allowed a full opportunity of defending himself in the course of such an investigation, the Chief Commissioner would act on that report and dispense with any special enquiry under the Pilots Act. But the Committee have suggested, and I should like to emphasise the suggestion, that, for the purpose of facilitating this proceeding and preventing the necessity for summoning two Courts, it is very desirable to amend the Merchant Shipping Act in such a way as to enable a Court of Inquiry held under that Act to formulate and try a charge against a pilot in somewhat the same manner as it can formulate and try a charge against a master, mate or engineer."

The Motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble MR. ILBERT also moved that the Bill as amended be passed.

The Motion was put and agreed to.

UNIVERSITIES DEGREES BILL.

The Hon'ble MR. ILBERT moved that the Bill to authorize the Universities of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay to grant certain honorary degrees be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Hon'ble Messrs. Gibbs and Reynolds and the Mover. He said:—

"This Bill was introduced by the Hon'ble Mr. Gibbs last February, and the only order passed upon it was that it should be published in the official Gazette. On looking into the papers, however, it seemed desirable to make one or two minor amendments which could be more conveniently dealt with by a Select Committee. But no action will be taken upon the Bill until Mr. Gibbs returns."

The Motion was put and agreed to.

MÚLTÁN LAWS BILL.

The Hon'ble MR. ILBERT moved for leave to introduce a Bill to declare the law in force in certain lands which have been, or hereafter may be, ceded by the Baháwalpúr State for occupation by the Indus Valley State Railway. He said that, under an existing Act (Act X of 1880), the law in force in the Múltán District was declared to be in force in certain lands which had been before the passing of that Act ceded for the purpose of the Indus Valley State Railway and annexed to the Múltán District. Since the passing of the Act of 1880 certain other lands had been ceded for the same purpose and annexed to Múltán, and it was obvious that the Act could not apply to them. Under these circumstances, it was thought convenient to repeal the Act and re-enact it in a more general form, so as to declare the law which was to be in force in all lands either already ceded, or hereafter to be ceded, for the purposes of this Railway, and which had been or might be annexed to Múltán or any other district of the Panjáb.

The Motion was put and agreed to.

BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

The Hon'ble SIR STEUART BAYLEY moved that the Hon'ble Mr. Hunter be added to the Select Committee on the Bill to amend and consolidate certain enactments relating to the law of Landlord and Tenant within the territories under the administration of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

The Motion was put and agreed to.

The Council adjourned to Wednesday, the 5th September, 1883.

Letter No. 2763, dated 5th November 1881, from the Government of Bombay.

Letter No. 747R., dated 15th November 1881, from the Government of Madras.

OBSERVATIONS.—In the papers now read again, proposals were discussed for the amalgamation of the officers of the Consulting Engineer's Departments of Madras and Bombay with the Railway Branch of the Government of India. It was recorded, in the event of such amalgamation being carried out, that no officer would be withdrawn from or sent to either Local Government without their previous concurrence, and that the arrangement would in no way interfere with the present system of control over the railways under the administrative charge of the Local Governments. The Governments of Madras and Bombay assented to these proposals.

RESOLUTION.—On a review of these proceedings, His Excellency the Governor General in Council is now pleased to direct that the officers of the several Consulting Engineer's Departments in India be brought on the roster of the Railway Branch of the Government of India, Public Works Department.

2. In order to give effect to this decision, the officers of the Madras and Bombay lists named below will be transferred to the Railway list, and they will carry the appointments in the graded list they now hold, from their own list, to the Railway list. As regards promotion, the officers now brought on to the Government of India list will be promoted pari passu with officers immediately below them on the Government of India list, and will be treated as supernumeraries in their grade or class for a period not to exceed 2½ years from the 1st January 1884. After the 1st July 1886 those of them who remain will be absorbed into the sanctioned scale as vacancies occur :—

Lieutenant-Colonel C. J. Smith, R.E., Executive Engineer, 1st Grade, Deputy Consulting Engineer.

3. Colonel Shaw-Stewart holds the personal rank of Chief Engineer, Class III, his post on the Madras Establishment being that of a Superintending Engineer. He will continue on the same footing on the Railway list; that is to say, until he is eventually absorbed in the Chief Engineer class, the Superintending Engineer's post will be kept vacant.

4. According to the above arrangements, the several scales will be respectively reduced and increased, as shown below :—

			Madras.	Bombay.	Railway.
Chief Engineer, Class II	...	...	...	— 1	+ 1
Superintending Engineers	...	...	— 1	...	+ 1
Executive Engineer, 1st Grade	...	...	— 1	...	+ 1

Ditto, 2nd Grade, sub. pro tem.	...	...	— 1	...	+ 1
Ditto, 4th Grade	...	...	...	— 1	+ 1

5. With a view to compensate for the loss of the post of Chief Engineer, Class II, transferred from Bombay to the Government of India list, the second Chief Engineer on the Bombay Establishment will be eligible for promotion to Class II when he is senior to the senior Class III Chief Engineer on the Government of India list; the scale of Chief Engineers on the Government of India list being increased by one Class III, and reduced by one Class II, appointment, whenever under this rule the second Chief Engineer, Bombay, holds the rank of Class II. But the rule will not come into effect until the retirement of Colonel Hancock, or until the date on which the Class III Chief Engineer now on the Bombay list would, in the ordinary course, have been promoted to Class II.

Definition of "port."

Licensing of Pilots.

- (a) for the conduct of the examinations and for the qualifications to be required;
- (b) establishing grades of pilots, and determining the duties which may be undertaken by pilots of each grade;
- (c) for the grant to qualified persons of licenses to act as pilots of any grade at any port; and

Provided that a prosecution shall not be instituted in respect of any such breach except by order of such officer as the Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, appoint in this behalf.

6. (1) If the Chief Commissioner has reason to believe that there are grounds for charging any pilot licensed under this Act with incompetency or misconduct in the discharge of his duties as such pilot, or with any act or omission in breach of a rule made under section 5, and that the charge cannot be satisfactorily investigated by an ordinary Court, he may direct that a special Court be constituted, under this Act, at the port at which it will, in his opinion, be most convenient for the parties and witnesses to attend, and shall then send to the Court a statement of the grounds of the charge, and direct the Court to make an investigation into the charge.

(2) When the Chief Commissioner directs an investigation under this section, he may, if he thinks fit, appoint a person to act as prosecutor in the investigation.

(2) The other assessors shall be summoned by the president in such manner as may be prescribed by rule, out of two lists, one of merchants, the other of pilots, to be, from time to time, prepared for the purpose and published by the Chief Commissioner in the British Burma Gazette. If there are no such lists, or if it is impracticable to procure the attendance of two persons one of whom is named in the list of merchants and the other in list of pilots, the other assessors or assessor, as the case may be, shall be appointed and summoned by the president.

11. The assessors shall receive such fees as the Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, by rule, prescribe.

12. Before any investigation under this Act is commenced, the special Court shall supply the pilot with a copy of the statement sent, under section 6, to the Court.

13. For the purpose of an investigation under this Act, the special Court may summon the pilot to appear before it, and shall give him full opportunity of making a defence, either in person or otherwise.

14. For the purpose of an investigation under this Act, the special Court shall, so far as relates to compelling the attendance, and to the examination, of witnesses, the production of documents and the regulation of the proceedings, have the same powers as are exercisable by the principal Court of original criminal jurisdiction for the place at which the investigation is made.

15. On the completion of the investigation, the special Court shall send to the Chief Commissioner a full report of the conclusions at which it has arrived. The report shall be in accordance with the opinion of the majority of the members of the Court, or, if the Court is equally divided, in accordance with the opinion of the president and with the member with whom he concurs. - (c) the procedure of the Court.

(2) All such rules shall be published in the British Burma Gazette, and shall thereupon have the force of law.

Power to cancel, suspend or reduce Licenses.

17. The Chief Commissioner may cancel or suspend, or reduce the grade of, any license granted to a pilot under this Act in the following cases, that is to say:—

Power to cancel, suspend or reduce license for misconduct, &c.

- (a) if the pilot is found guilty by a Criminal Court of any offence punishable under section 5, or of any other offence the commission of which, in the opinion of the Chief Commissioner, shows him to be unfit to discharge the duties of a pilot; or

(b) if, on considering a report submitted under section 15 of this Act, or transmitted under section 17 of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, the Chief Commissioner is of opinion that the pilot is incompetent, or has been guilty of any misconduct in the discharge of his duty as pilot, or of any breach of a rule made under section 5 of this Act.

18. When a prosecution has been instituted against a pilot under section 5, or an investigation has been ordered in respect of him under section 6, or an investigation affecting his conduct has been ordered under Chapter II of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, the Chief Commissioner may suspend his license until the trial is concluded or the report of the investigation is submitted or transmitted to the Chief Commissioner, as the case may be.

Bills introduced into the Council of the Governor General for making Laws and Regulations, or published under Rule 22.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

[First publication.]

The following Bill was introduced into the Council of the Governor General of India for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations on the 5th September, 1883 :—

No. 19 of 1883.

A Bill to declare the law in force in certain lands which have been or hereafter may be ceded by the Baháwalpur State for occupation by the Indus Valley State Railway.

WHEREAS Act X of 1880 (to declare the law in force in certain lands annexed to the Multán District) provides that all enactments which, on the second day of September, 1879, were in force in the Multán district and not in force in the lands occupied by the Indus Valley State Railway, and the works, premises and stations thereof, within the limits of the Baháwalpur State which have been ceded to the British Government in full sovereignty by that State, and have been declared by the Governor General in Council to be subject to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb, and have by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjáb been annexed to the Multán district, shall be deemed to have come into force in the said lands on that day; and whereas it is expedient to make like provision for certain other lands occupied by the same Railway, and the works, premises and stations thereof, within the limits of the same State, which have, since the second day of September, 1879, been ceded to the British Government in full sovereignty by the same State, and have been declared by the Governor General in Council to be subject to the same Lieutenant-Governorship and have by the same Lieutenant-Governor been annexed to the same district;

and whereas it is also expedient to make like provision for any lands to be hereafter occupied by the same Railway, and the works, premises and stations thereof, within the limits of the same State which may be ceded to the British Government in full sovereignty by the same State and may be declared by the Governor General in Council to be subject to the same Lieutenant-Governorship, and may by the same Lieutenant-Governor be annexed to the same or some other district;

It is hereby enacted as follows :—

Repeal of Act X of 1880. 1. Act X of 1880 is hereby repealed.

2. All enactments which, on the date on which any such lands as are referred to in the preamble to this Act have been, or may hereafter be, annexed to the Multán or any other district, were, or shall be, in force in that district, and not in the said lands, shall be deemed to have come, or, as the case may be, shall come, into force in the said lands on that date.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

ACT X of 1880 (to declare the law in force in certain lands annexed to the Multán District) provides that all enactments which, on the second day of September, 1879, were in force in the Multán district and not in force in the lands occupied by the Indus Valley State Railway, and the works, stations and premises thereof within the limits of the Bahawalpur State which have been ceded in full sovereignty by that State to the British Government and have been declared by the Governor General in Council to be subject to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb and have by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjáb been annexed to the Multán district, shall be deemed to have come into force in the said lands on that date.

2. But since the second day of September, 1879, certain other lands occupied by the same Railway within the limits of the same State have also been ceded to the British Government, and have in like manner been declared by the Governor General in Council to be subject to the same Lieutenant-Governorship, and have by the same Lieutenant-Governor been annexed to the same district. It is obvious that the Act of 1880, which is limited to the lands which were annexed to the Multán district on the second day of September, 1879, does not provide for these lands. It is further possible that other lands may hereafter be ceded by the same State for occupation by the same Railway and may be annexed to the same or some other district of the Panjáb. Under these circumstances, it has been thought desirable to repeal the special enactment of 1880, and to pass a general enactment on the same lines declaring the law in force in all the lands within the Bahawalpur State which may have been, or may hereafter be, ceded to the British Government for occupation by the Indus Valley State Railway, and which may have been, or may hereafter be, annexed to the Multán or any other district of the Panjáb.

(2) When such resolution has been passed, the committee shall publish a notice, defining the class of persons or description of property proposed to be taxed, the amount or rate of the tax to be imposed and the system of assessment to be adopted.

(3) Any inhabitant objecting to the proposed tax may, within thirty days from the publication of the notice, submit his objection in writing to the committee, and the committee shall, at a special meeting, take such objection into consideration.

(4) If no such objection is received, or if such objection, having been considered as aforesaid, is deemed insufficient, the committee may forward its proposals to the Local Government, together with the objections (if any) which have been submitted as aforesaid, and with its decision thereupon.

Panjab Municipal Bill, 1883.
(Chapter III.—Taxation and Municipal Fund.)

(2) The Local Government may, by notification, and the committee may, by resolution passed at a special meeting and confirmed by the Local Government, exempt from the payment of any tax, toll or fee imposed under this Act, any person or class of persons or any description of property.

[Act XV of 1873, section 19; Act VII of 1874, section 15; Bengal Act V of 1876, section 369.] 38. No tax, toll or fee imposed under this Act, and no proceedings of committee at any ordinary or special meeting, shall be invalid merely for defect of form; and it shall be enough in any such tax on property, or any assessment of value for the purpose of making such tax, if the property taxed or assessed be so described as to be generally known; and it shall not be necessary to name the owner or occupier thereof.

[Madras Act III of 1871, s. 41.] 39. Any tax imposed under section 33, sub-section (1), clause (a), or under section 34, shall be payable by the owner of the house, building and land, respectively, from and after the end of the first quarter of the year for which it is assessed.

[Madras Act III of 1871, s. 43; Bengal Act V of 1876, s. 94.] 40. The committee shall cause a valuation-list of all houses, buildings and lands on which such tax is imposed to be prepared, containing the name of the street or division in which such property is situate, the designation of the property, either by name or number, sufficient to identify the same, the name of the owner, or if the occupier, and not the owner, is the person liable to pay the tax, the name of the occupier, the annual value, area or length of frontage upon which the property is assessed, and the amount of the tax assessed thereon by the committee.

[Madras Act III of 1871, section 45.] 41. When the name of the owner or occupier is not known, it shall be sufficient to designate him in the said list, and also in any notice or other proceeding under this Act, as the "owner" or the "occupier" of the property on which the tax is assessed, without further description.

[Madras Act III of 1871, section 46; Bengal Act V of 1876, section 103.] 42. When the valuation has been completed, the committee shall give public notice thereof, and of the place where the list or copy thereof may be inspected, and every person claiming to be the owner or occupier of property included in the assessment, or the agent of such person, shall be at liberty to inspect the entries in such list or copy relating to such property, and to make extracts thereof without charge.

[Madras Act III of 1871, section 47.] 43. (1) The committee shall at the same time give public notice of a day and hour, not less than one month from the publication of such notice, when they will proceed to revise the said valuation and assessment; and in all cases in which any property is for the first time assessed, or the assessment is increased, shall give special notice thereof to the owners or occupiers of such property.

(2) All objections to such valuation and assessment shall be made at or before the time fixed in the notice.

[Madras Act III of 1871, section 48.] 44. After the objections have been enquired into and the revision of the valuation and assessment has been completed, the amendments made in the list shall be authenticated by the signatures of not less than two members of the committee, who shall at the same time certify that no valid objection has been made to the valuation and assessment contained in the list, except in the cases in which amendments have been entered therein; and, subject to such amendments as may thereafter be duly made, the tax so assessed shall be deemed to be the tax for the whole year for which the assessment is made.

45. The committee may at any time amend the list by inserting the name of any person whose name ought to be inserted, or by inserting any property liable to the tax, or by altering the assessment on any property which has been insufficiently valued or assessed through mistake or fraud, or the value of which has been increased by the construction of any new building or by additions to or alterations in any building thereon, after giving notice to any person interested in such amendment of a day, not less than fifteen days from the date of service of such notice, on which the amendment is to be made;

and any person interested in such amendment may tender his objection to the committee by application in writing at or before the time fixed in the notice.

46. It shall not be necessary to prepare a new valuation-list every year; but the committee may adopt the valuation and assessment contained in the list for the preceding year, with such alterations as may in particular cases be deemed necessary, as the valuation and assessment for the year following, giving the same public notice of such valuation and assessment as if a new valuation-list had been prepared.

47. (1) When any sum is due for any tax leviable under section 33, sub-section (1), clause (a), or under section 34, the committee shall cause a bill for the amount, stating the property and the period for which the charge is made, to be presented to the person liable to pay the same.

(2) If the bill be not paid within ten days from the presentation thereof, the committee may cause a notice of demand to be served upon such person; and if such person do not, within seven days from the service of such notice, pay the sum due, with any fee leviable for the notice, or show sufficient cause for non-payment of the same, the sum due, together with such fee, shall be deemed to be an arrear of tax.

48. If the sum due from the owner of the house, building or land remains unpaid after notice of demand has been duly served, the committee may demand the amount from the occupier for the time being, and may proceed against him in all respects as if he were the owner; and if the amount is paid by, or recovered from, the occupier, he may deduct the amount so paid or recovered from the next and following payments of rent:

Panjab Municipal Bill, 1883.

Provided that no arrear which has remained due from the owner for more than one year shall be so recovered from the occupier.

The committee may cause any property so seized or so much thereof as is necessary to be sold by auction to satisfy such demand, together with the expenses occasioned by the seizure, custody and sale thereof, unless such demand and expenses are in the meantime paid, after the lapse of five days from the seizure, and after the issue of a proclamation fixing the time and place of sale, a copy of which shall be served upon the person entitled to the property at least 48 hours before the sale:

Provided that, by order of the chairman or vice-chairman, articles of a perishable nature which could not be kept for five days without serious risk of damage may be sold after the lapse of twenty-four hours.

Plow-draft No. 50. Plow-draft No. (2) Every person assessing octroi tax by the authority of the committee shall, on request by the person introducing taxable articles on which such tax is claimed, present him with a bill specifying the articles taxable, the amount claimed, and the rate at which the tax is calculated; and any person receiving payment of the whole or any part of the tax claimed shall on request receipt the said bill accordingly.

Act 1871, s. 78.] 51. The collection of any octroi tax or toll may be leased by the committee, with the previous sanction of the Commissioner of the division, for any period not exceeding one year; and the lessee and all persons employed by him in the management and collection of such octroi tax or toll shall be bound by any rules made by the committee for their guidance, and shall have the same powers, and be subject to the same responsibilities, as if they were employed by the committee for the management and collection of such octroi tax or toll. Any dispute between the lessee and any person from whom such tax or toll is demanded shall be referred to the committee, whose decision thereupon shall be final.

52. (1) The committee may require the owners or occupiers of houses, buildings or lands to furnish them with returns of the measurements and of the rent or annual value thereof; and the committee or any person appointed by them for that purpose may, at any time between sunrise and sunset, enter and inspect and measure any such houses, buildings or lands, after having given 48 hours previous notice in writing to the occupiers thereof.

(2) The committee, or any person authorized by them in writing for that purpose, may also, at any time between sunrise and sunset, enter and inspect any stable, coach-house or other place wherein they may have reason to believe that there is any vehicle or animal liable to taxation under this Act, for which a license has not been duly taken out.

53. No objection shall be taken to any valuation or assessment, nor shall the liability of any person to be assessed or taxed be questioned except under this Act, in any other manner or by any other authority than in this Act is provided.

54. For all sums paid on account of any tax under this Act, a receipt, stating the amount and the tax on account of which it is paid, shall be given by the person receiving the same, on request by the person making the payment.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

THE law at present applicable to municipalities in the Panjáb is contained in Act IV of 1873.

2. Except in a few of the larger municipalities, all the members of the municipal committees constituted under that Act have hitherto been nominated; but, for the reasons stated in Panjáb Government Resolution No. 1777, dated 7th September, 1882, it is thought desirable to give the committees a more representative character than they have hitherto had, and for this purpose it is proposed that, unless where special reasons exist against resorting to a system of election, a portion at least of the members of each committee should be chosen by the inhabitants of the municipality.

3. It is further believed that greater powers of initiating action and of controlling the administration and expenditure of their funds for the benefit of the inhabitants of the municipality may with advantage be given to committees than, except in a few of the more important municipalities, they possess under existing rules, if sufficient powers of control are reserved to prevent the interests of the public from being endangered by neglect, abuse of powers or mistake as to the extent of their powers, on the part of the municipal bodies.

4. It would be possible to carry out the measures necessary for these purposes by rules under the existing Act, but the amendment of the Act appears to be a more suitable mode giving effect to the proposals of the Local Government, and this course has therefore been preferred.

5. It has also for a considerable time past been known that Act IV of 1873 is very defective in omitting to provide for many of the powers with which it is usually considered desirable to invest municipal bodies and their servants, some of which were expressly given by the later Acts, XV of 1873 and VII of 1874, passed for the North-Western Provinces and British Burma respectively; and serious doubts have arisen as to the validity of some of the bye-laws framed to carry out and supplement its provisions, and as to the authority of municipalities to take action which it is important for the public interest that they should have the power to take. The opportunity has therefore been taken to redraft the entire Act, after referring to the corresponding Acts in force in other parts of India, with a view to remove the defects which have been brought to light by experience of its working for upwards of ten years.

6. The draft is divided into seven chapters nearly corresponding with those of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh Municipalities Bill, but it differs from that Bill in not proposing to treat the new committees as different bodies from the committees now in existence and it also enters into greater detail in the chapters on the subjects of taxation and of the powers and duties of committees. In some other respects its provisions are necessarily different, being framed with reference to the peculiar circumstances of the Panjáb, and therefore corresponding more or less closely with those of the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill.

7. The preliminary chapter provides for the repeal of Act IV of 1873, and for the procedure to be adopted when it is proposed to establish a new municipality, to alter the limits of an existing municipality, or to withdraw any local area from the operation of the Act. It also provides for the division of municipalities into two classes, it being considered unnecessary to retain the third class committees, the orders and proceedings of which, under the rules now in force, are subject to the confirmation of the Deputy Commissioner before they can take effect. The power given by section 6 to withdraw any local area from the operation of the Act is required to meet cases in which petty municipalities have been established in places where experience has shown that municipal institutions cannot be continued with advantage, or that a sufficient municipal income cannot be raised without having recourse to forms of taxation which would either be extremely unpopular or would not meet with the approval of Government. The third class committees, where it is not necessary to abolish them for reasons of this nature, can be transferred to the second class.

8. Chapter II relates to the organization of committees. The provisions of section 7, as to the appointment or election of the members, are similar to those of the Local Self-government Bill, and, as in that Bill, the circumstances under which election, when once introduced may be departed from are defined as far as possible. While the existing Act requires only two-fifths of the members to be other than salaried officers of Government, the Bill raises the proportion to two-thirds unless when such officers are elected as members.

9. The term of office, except in the case of members appointed ex officio, is to be fixed by the Local Government, but not to exceed three years, and, when this term is adopted, provision is made for the members retiring by rotation.

10. The provisions as to the removal of members are, with slight variations, the same as those contained in the Local Self-government Bill. The incorporation of committees and the control of transfers of property made by them and of investments by them of money in the public funds are also similarly provided for.

11. Section 15 provides for the election of the chairman by the committee, subject to the approval of the Local Government, unless where Government otherwise orders, but enables the committee, instead of electing, to apply to the Local Government to appoint a chairman from among its members. Vice-chairmen will also be elected when necessary. The term of office of the chairman is fixed by section 16 at three years, if he so long continues to be a member of the committee, but power is given to the Local Government to remove him, if moved to do so by two-thirds of the members of committee present at a special meeting.

12. Sections 19 to 26 deal with the conduct of business and the framing of rules of business. Section 25, following the precedent of the Madras and Bengal Acts, enable the chairman, or, in his absence, the vice-chairman, in cases of emergency, to exercise all powers of the committee which the Act does not require to be exercised by the committee at a meeting.

13. Section 27 provides for the appointment of joint committees when co-operation between different committees is necessary, as in the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill.

14. Sections 28 to 30 relate to the officers and servants to be employed by committees. Of these, only section 28, which deals with the appointment of a secretary, has no corresponding provision in the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill. When a paid secretary is appointed, his appointment, removal, and salary are made subject to the sanction of the Commissioner, with a view to secure the appointment of a competent man to this important office, and to supply the guarantee against arbitrary dismissal, without which it might be difficult to get a competent man to accept office. The power of control in regard to other appointments, given by section 29 to the Deputy Commissioner, has been made applicable to all committees at the suggestion of the Delhi municipal committee, which considered such a check desirable in all cases.

15. Chapter III, on the subject of taxation and the municipal fund, is much fuller than the provisions of the existing Act upon the same subject. Section 7 of Act IV of 1873, which relates to the imposition of taxes, contains no description of the taxes which may be imposed. Section 33 now specifies the taxes which may, with the previous sanction of the Local Government, be imposed for general purposes, and authorizes the imposition of other taxes, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council; section 34 provides for additional taxes on property, when necessary for special objects, such as the improvement of the water-supply; and section 35 describes the tolls and fees which the committee may be empowered to levy; while section 36 prescribes the procedure to be followed in imposing taxes; and section 37 provides for exemptions. Some of the taxes specified, such as a tax on professions and tolls on vehicles and animals, are not at present levied in any municipality in the province; but it has been considered desirable to include them, as it may, in some cases, be necessary to find a substitute for octroi, which forms the chief source of income in almost all Panjáb municipalities, and these taxes have been resorted to for this purpose in other provinces. In the case of tolls, it is expressly provided that they may be imposed only where no octroi is levied. Other taxes are at present sanctioned for particular municipalities such as Simla, and it has therefore been necessary to include them, without reference to whether they are suitable for adoption in other cases.

16. Section 8, Act IV of 1873, prohibits the collection of taxes until the assessment has been confirmed as prescribed by rules made by the Local Government. This provision, which, however appropriate in the case of direct taxes, is clearly inapplicable to indirect taxes like the octroi, has been omitted from the present Bill, but sections 39 to 48 lay down rules for the assessment, confirmation and collection of taxes on immoveable property; and sections 49 and 50 provide for the collection of the octroi tax; while section 97 empowers the Local Government to make rules as to the assessment and collection of other taxes.

17. Section 51 gives a power to lease octroi and tolls, which is believed not to exist under the present Act, but which is likely to be found useful in some cases.

18. Section 52 enables the committee to call for returns and to enter premises in order to obtain such information as they may require for purposes of taxation.

19. Appeals against taxes or assessments are provided for by sections 55 to 57.

20. Under section 9 of Act IV of 1873, municipal taxes may be collected as if they were arrears of land-revenue. It is not proposed to maintain this rule now that committees are about to be placed in a more independent position than hitherto, and it is not well adapted to indirect taxes like the octroi. Power is, therefore, given by section 49 to seize any articles on which any octroi, tax or toll is chargeable in default of payment, and to recover arrears of taxes generally by distress and sale under the orders of a Magistrate.

21. Chapter IV deals with the subject of the powers and duties of committees, and is also much more in detail than the corresponding sections of Act IV of 1873.

22. Sections 60 to 65 relate to the municipal police. It is necessary to maintain the liability of the municipal fund for the charges of the establishment ordinarily employed on police-duty within municipal limits, as, when the Local Government takes over such charges, this will usually be done in consideration of the committee agreeing to undertake services within the municipality to which the municipal fund can properly be applied, the cost of which has hitherto been borne by Government, and such agreements may be for a limited period and have to be renewed from time to time. Section 61 provides for agreements of this nature.

23. The police-establishment may consist either of a part of the general police force or of a body of watchmen, as the Local Government thinks fit; and section 62 enables the Local Government to regulate its duties in either case, and, where it is a body of watchmen, to fix its strength and the grades and pay of its members; and makes provisions for the powers, protection, responsibilities and punishment of the members of such body, which are considered to be more suitable than those contained in Act XXIV of 1881, which is the present law on the subject.

24. It is not the practice to entertain separate establishments for the preservation of the peace and the prevention of crime and for watch and ward, members of the general police force or municipal watchmen, as the case may be, being employed on both duties; and it is held to be desirable that they should continue to be available for both duties. Sections 62 to 64 therefore place municipal watchmen on a similar footing to members of the general police force, so far as is possible without enrolling them in that force, bringing them under the same rules as to pay and pension, and making them liable to general service. It is therefore proposed to place them under the orders of the District Superintendent of Police, and the Local Government may relieve committees of any charge for them, in the same way as it may do where a police-establishment enrolled under Act V of 1861 is entertained.

25. Section 66 gives a more detailed statement of the duties of municipal committees and the purposes to which the municipal fund may be applied than is to be found in section 11 of the present Act.

26. Sections 67 to 70 give powers to make rules prohibiting acts of the nature of nuisances. The powers to issue injunctions, and to make conditional orders for the removal of nuisances, have not hitherto been conferred upon committees in the Panjáb, but are taken, with some modifications, from the Municipal Acts in force in the North-Western Provinces and British Burma.

27. Section 71 specifies other purposes for which committees may make rules binding on the public, and section 72 adds a special power to committees in hill stations to make rules on subjects which, in such localities, it has been found necessary to enable committees to regulate. The confirmation of such rules, and the penalties incurred by infringing them, are provided for by section 73. Section 21 of the present Act prescribes a uniform penalty, but it has been thought better to enable the committees, when making a rule, to attach to it an appropriate penalty.

28. Sections 74 to 85 give powers of interference with trades and rights of property which have hitherto usually been taken in bye-laws. Such powers are expressly given in the Municipal Acts of the Bengal, Madras and Bombay Legislatures, and it has been thought better to give them in the Bill than to leave them to depend upon the authority of bye-laws. They may not be required in some of the minor municipalities, but a subsequent provision will admit of these municipalities being excepted from this part of the Bill.

29. Section 89 enables the Local Government to invest members of committee or officers of the committee by name or a sub-committee with the power to summon persons committing offences punishable under section 67 before a Magistrate, and to accept composition for such offences from persons who are willing to pay such composition in preference to appearing before a Magistrate to answer the charge. A provision of this nature was suggested by the Local Government as likely to be suitable in places like Simla, in reply to a proposal to give the secretary to the committee the powers of a Magistrate for the disposal of petty cases of nuisance; and, as the section is framed, no such power will exist unless where the Local Government thinks proper to confer it.

30. Chapter V, relating to control, differs in no material respect from the corresponding provisions of the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill.

31. Section 97 enables the Local Government to prescribe such forms as it may consider necessary, and specifies the subjects on which it may make rules supplementary to the provisions of the Act.

32. Chapter VI contains miscellaneous provisions as to the effect of a member or servant of a committee being interested in any contract with the committee, the liabilities of members, suit against committees, prosecutions for infringement of rules, the acquisition of land, the procedure to be followed in making rules, and the like.

33. Chapter VII provides for the disposal of property vested in committees when the area subject to their authority or part thereof is withdrawn from the operation of the Act under section 6; for excepting municipalities from any provisions of the Act unsuitable thereto; and, in the same way as in the Local Self-government Bill, for the saving of the rights of existing officers and servants, and for the control to which Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners are to be subject in the discharge of their duties under the Act.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

REVENUE AND AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

REPORTS ON THE STATE OF THE SEASON AND PROSPECTS OF THE CROPS FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 4th SEPTEMBER 1883.

GENERAL REMARKS.—The weather during the past week has been generally favourable all over India. In the Bombay Presidency good rain has fallen in Guzerat and the Deccan, and prospects are greatly improved. In Sind the rain has been light and partial, and there is a scarcity of water for irrigation owing to the low level of the river, which is injuriously affecting the crops. There has been a copious fall of rain in the Berars and crops there are flourishing. In Hyderabad the tanks have been replenished and prospects are also good. Timely and in most parts sufficient rain is reported throughout Central India, and fears are no longer entertained of a failure of the crops.

At Nowgong, however, the fall was little more than half an inch, and more rain is needed. In the Rajputana States the rainfall though general has been very unequal. Only a few light showers have fallen in Marwar and the crops continue to wither, but more rain is expected and later reports are much more favourable. In Meywar there was abundant rain during the week, but unfortunately too late to benefit standing crops. Prospects in other parts of Rajputana have greatly improved.

In the Kurnool and Ganjam districts of the Madras Presidency, and in Travancore and Coorg, some injury has been done to ripening crops by excessive rain. In the Karnatic, on the other hand, the fall has been deficient in parts, and more is needed. On the whole, however, prospects continue favourable in the Madras Presidency, Coorg and Mysore.

In Burma the rainfall of the week has been generally heavy and some injury has been caused in several districts by inundations, otherwise the rice crops are flourishing. In Assam there has been more extensive destruction of crops from the same cause, particularly in Cachar where one-third of the standing crop is estimated to have been damaged; the flood however is now subsiding. In Bengal prospects are fair, but the rainfall of the week has been light, and more is wanted for transplanting of rice. The recent floods have caused considerable loss in Behar and Howrah.

Heavy rain has fallen throughout the Central Provinces except Sambalpur, and prospects are generally favourable. In Sambalpur more rain is needed for the rice crop. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh the rain has been very unequally distributed, and in many places it was too light to benefit the crops. Prospects are on the whole improved, but the unirrigated khariif crops in several districts have suffered severely, especially in the western half of the province.

Except in the frontier districts on the North-West, good rain fell during the week all over the Punjab and prospects are much brighter, but more rain is still wanted generally.

Harvest operations continue in the Madras Presidency. In the Deccan preparations for the rabi have been delayed by heavy rain. The damage by locusts to standing crops has not yet been great. Young locusts have also appeared in the Manpur State, Central India.

In the Central Provinces and North-Western Provinces and Oudh the early khariif crops are being harvested and the fields are being prepared for the rabi.

In Bengal harvesting of jute and early rice is still in progress, and late rice is being transplanted. In Burma transplanting and sowing are almost over.

Cholera continues to decrease, except in Nagpur and Wardha where it is severe.

Cattle-disease of a mild type is reported from most provinces, but the fall of rain has much improved the pasturage where fodder was getting scarce.

Prices are generally on the decline.

tration of Municipalities in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

PANJÁB MUNICIPAL BILL.

The Hon'ble MR. BARKLEY moved for leave to introduce a Bill to make better provision for the Organization and Administration of Municipalities in the Panjáb. He said :—

“My Lord, when the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill was introduced about three months ago, it was explained that the legislation which might be required with regard to municipalities had been reserved for separate consideration.

“Some of the Panjáb municipalities may be said to have arrived at the age of majority, as they were originally established 21 years ago, and many more were formed before the passing of Act XV of 1867, which was the first Act of the Legislature passed with special reference to them. A few, such as Delhi and Simla, had been formed under the provisions of a General Act, XXVI of 1850, relating to improvements in towns; but the majority received no legal recognition before the passing of Act XV of 1867. That was a temporary Act, its duration having been originally limited to five years, and afterwards extended for one year more by an Act passed in 1872. Its place was taken in 1873 by Act IV of 1873, which contains the law now applicable to all municipalities in the Panjáb.

“Act IV of 1873 is a short Act consisting of only 23 sections, being less than half the number of sections contained in the similar Act passed in the same year for the North-Western Provinces and Oudh; and though its provisions have been supplemented by rules framed under it by the Local Government and rules and bye-laws made by committees with the sanction of the Local Government, it has been found to be defective in many particulars in regard to which the Municipal Acts in force in other parts of India contain express provisions. These defects were brought to the notice of the Panjáb Government so long ago as 1876 by Mr. Plowden, now the senior Judge of the Chief Court, who was then Government Advocate; and, though it was not found necessary to ask for legislation at the time, the experience of the last few years shews that steps must now be taken to remedy them.

“While it would have been possible to give effect to the proposals for the extension of local self-government in municipalities made by the Local Government in its Resolution No. 1777, dated 7th September, 1882, by rules under the existing Act, the amendment of that Act appeared to be a more suitable mode of effecting this purpose. The present Bill has accordingly been framed, both with this object and with a view to remove the defects known to exist in the law now in force. It is proposed to repeal Act IV of 1873, so that the whole of the law applicable to municipalities in the Panjáb may be included in one Act.

“The provisions of the Bill are fully explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, and I do not therefore propose to do more than notice some of the more important alterations which it will make in the law.

“By the rules in force under Act IV of 1873, committees are divided into three classes, but the orders and proceedings of committees of the third class are subject to the confirmation of the Deputy Commissioner before they can take effect. The classification of municipalities is now provided for by the Bill, but only two classes are retained, it being thought that any municipalities, the committees of which cannot with advantage be placed in a position of greater independence than that of the third class committees at present, had better be abolished, while those which are fit for higher powers can be transferred to the second class.

“Except in a few of the more important municipalities, in which a portion of the members have hitherto been elected, all the members of municipal committees have hitherto been nominated. It is now proposed to give the committees a more representative character, and for this purpose to have recourse to election where this can properly be done. There are cases, especially on the frontier, in which no form of election would be suitable, and the section relating to the constitution of committees therefore provides either for election or for appointment in the same way as in the Local Self-government Bill, defining, as far as possible, the circumstances under which the system of election, when once introduced, may be departed from. It also raises the proportion of members other than salaried officers of Government from two-fifths to two-thirds of the committee, unless when such officers are elected as members.

“Though, under the existing Act committees might be empowered to elect their chairman, the rules under the Act make the Deputy Commissioner chairman of all municipal committees in his district, and it is only in a few recent instances that any committees have been empowered to elect. Under the Bill, the chairman will be elected, subject to the approval of the Local Government, except where that Government may by notification otherwise direct, but the committee, instead of electing, may apply to the Local Government, to appoint a chairman from among its members. In some cases it is believed that committees will prefer this course to having to make the choice of one of their members as chairman themselves.

“A section has been introduced, enabling the chairman, or in his absence the vice-chairman, in cases of emergency, to exercise all powers of the committee which the Act does not require to be exercised by the committee at a meeting.

“When a paid secretary is appointed, his appointment, removal and salary are made subject to the sanction of the Commissioner of the division. The office is one for which it is highly important to secure the appointment of a competent man, and such a man might not care to accept office under a committee without some guarantee against arbitrary dismissal. Other servants may be employed by the committee, the Deputy Commissioner being given such powers of control as are necessary to prevent improper appointments or the employment of too large or too expensive an establishment, subject to appeal to the Commissioner. It was at the suggestion of one of the most important municipal committees in the province—that of Delhi—that this check was made applicable to all committees, and not, as originally intended, to second class committees only.

“The subject of taxation is much more fully dealt with in Chapter III than in the corresponding sections (7 to 9) of the existing Act. Those sections contained no description of the taxes which might be imposed. This has now been supplied, and other taxes than those mentioned cannot be imposed without the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council. In the case of taxes on immoveable property, a maximum rate has been fixed. The rate of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on annual value, with the additional rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. which may be imposed for special objects, may appear high, but this was necessary to cover the rate of 10 per cent. on annual value now sanctioned in Simla. Similarly, the rate of three rupees per running foot of frontage which may be imposed as an alternative to the tax on annual value is the present rate in the main bázár of Simla. It may be regarded as certain that rates so high as these will only be sanctioned in very exceptional cases like that of Simla.

“Some of the taxes enumerated are not now levied in any municipality in the province, but have been included, as it may in some cases be necessary to provide a substitute for the octroi tax, which is the chief source of income of almost all Panjáb municipalities, but which cannot be continued where it is not possible to prevent it from operating as a tax upon through trade. In the case of tolls, which are not allowed by existing rules, it is provided that they may be imposed only where no octroi is levied.

“Instead of section 8 of the present Act, which prohibits the collection of any tax until the assessment has been confirmed as prescribed by rules made by the Local Government—a provision which is clearly inapplicable to direct taxation like the octroi tax—express rules have been laid down for the assessment, confirmation and collection of taxes on immoveable property, and for the collection of the octroi tax, and the Local Government has been empowered to make rules for the assessment and collections of other taxes. Appeals against taxes or assessments have also been provided for.

“Under the existing Act, municipal taxes may be recovered as arrears of land-revenue. For this a power to recover arrears by distress and sale under the orders of a Magistrate is substituted, and provision is also made for seizing articles on which any octroi tax or toll is chargeable in default of payment of the charge.

“Chapter IV, which relates to the powers and duties of committees, is also in much more detail than the corresponding sections 11 to 17 of the existing Act.

“While the cost of the municipal police is made, as before, a first charge on the municipal fund, provision is made for the Local Government relieving the committee of such charges on its agreeing to undertake services within the municipality, the cost of which has hitherto been borne by Government, and does not exceed the cost of the establishment ordinarily employed on police duty within the municipality. When the municipal police consists of a body of watchmen, it is proposed to place that body under the orders of the District Superintendent of Police, and provision is made for putting its members on a footing similar to that of members of the general police force, so far as is consistent with their not being enrolled in that force and subjected to general service nor brought under the same rules as to pay and pension.

“Section 67 enables committees, with the previous sanction of the Local Government, to make rules for the prohibition, prosecution or punishment of acts or omissions of a similar character to those punishable as public nuisances under the Indian Penal Code, and of offences against public decency. Its form resembles that adopted in the committee on the North-Western Provinces Bill for the similar section in that Bill. Sections 68 to 70 give powers for the prohibition of nuisances, and enable the Local Government to confer powers to issue conditional orders for the removal of nuisances which committees in the Panjáb have not hitherto possessed. These are taken, with some modification, from the Municipal Acts in force in the North-Western Provinces and in British Burma.

“In addition to the general powers given to committees to make rules, subject to the sanction of Government, binding on the public, for purposes which are stated more at length in the Bill than in the Act now in force, section 72 gives a special power to committees in hill stations to make rules for the regulation of traffic, and for the prevention of acts likely to cause serious injury, unless proper precautions are taken, being done without the permission of the committee. Examples of such acts are quarrying or making excavations and cutting down forest trees on private grounds. The general law is, of course, sufficient to prevent such acts being done on public property without proper authority.

“Sections 74 to 85 give certain powers of interference with objectionable trades and with private property, which it has been thought better to include in the Bill than to leave to depend upon the authority of bye-laws, as has hitherto been the case. In this respect the Bill follows the precedent of the Municipal Acts of the local Legislatures of Madras, Bombay and Bengal, though it does not go so far as those Acts do in defining the acts and omissions which should be prohibited within municipal limits.

“Section 89 enables the Local Government to give a power which it is thought may be found convenient in places like Simla, of accepting a small composition for petty nuisances out of Court instead of prosecuting, when the offender consents to pay such composition.

“The sections relating to control in Chapter V are similar to those in the Local Self-government Bill, and take the place of the wide power the Local Government possesses, under the existing law, to suspend or limit all or any of the powers of any committee, and to cancel any of their proceedings or rules. Some of the gentlemen consulted have thought that the powers given to local officers are too great, and have proposed that, in the case of first class committees at least, these powers should be exercised only by the Local Government, but the cases in which interference would be most necessary would generally be of such a nature as to call for prompter action than would be possible if nothing could be done until the facts had been reported to the Local Government, and time had been allowed for such enquiry as would satisfy Government that interference was called for.

“Section 94, which requires the orders of the Deputy Commissioner and Commissioner under the preceding sections to be forthwith reported to Government with a statement of the reasons for making them; and with any explanation which the committee may wish to offer, affords a check which should prevent any capricious or unnecessary interference; and this experience, which the more important municipal committees have already gained, should preserve them from falling into errors which would render interference necessary. But a sufficient power of control must be reserved to protect the public interests against the effects of negligence or ill-judged action on the part of committees, even though the cases may rarely occur in which any interference with the functions of the committee will be necessary. It is only subject to this condition that committees can be given greater freedom of action than they have hitherto had, but experienced committees, well informed as to the wants of the public, and willing to exert themselves to supply them, so far as the means at their disposal allow, have no cause to fear that they will be exposed to any undue interference.

“The power to make rules to supplement the provisions of the Act given to the Local Government by section 97 and the provisions of the concluding chapters of the Bill call for no remark.”

The Motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble MR. BARKLEY also introduced the Bill.

The Hon'ble MR. BARKLEY also moved that the Bill and Statement of Objects and Reasons be published in the Gazette of India and in the Panjab Government Gazette in English and in such other languages as the Local Government might think fit.

The Council adjourned to Wednesday, the 12th September, 1883.

EXTRA SUPPLEMENT TO The Gazette of India.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1883.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA. LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

No. 1411J., dated Calcutta, the 20th March 1882.

From—HORACE A. COCKERELL, Esq., C.S.I., Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial, Political and Appointment Departments,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to submit, for the consideration of the Government of India, the accompanying copy of a note † by Mr. B. L. Gupta, of the Bengal Civil Service, representing the anomalous position in which the Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service are placed under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which limit the jurisdiction to be exercised over European British subjects in the interior to Judicial officers who are themselves European British subjects. Chapter VII of Act X of 1872, which deals with the subject, has been reproduced in the new Code of Criminal Procedure (vide Chapter XXXIII of Act X of 1882).

2. The question raised in Mr. Gupta's note is one which requires full consideration, and on which the Government of India will probably deem it desirable to obtain the opinions of all the Local Governments and Administrations, inasmuch as it may not be expedient to apply to the Madras and Bombay Presidencies a rule which may be applicable to Bengal. Mr. Gupta desired that the question of the jurisdiction to be exercised by Covenanted Civilians over Europeans in the mofussil might be considered in connection with the Bill to amend Act X of 1872; but the Lieutenant-Governor felt that a discussion on the subject could not with propriety be raised at the final reading of that Bill. Sir Ashley Eden is, however, of opinion that the matter should receive full and careful consideration, whenever, on any future occasion, a fitting opportunity occurs.

3. As a question of general policy, it seems to the Lieutenant-Governor right that Covenanted Native Civilians should be empowered to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans as well as over Natives who are brought before them in their capacity as Criminal Judges. Now that Native Covenanted Civilians may shortly be expected to hold the office of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, it is also, as a matter of administrative convenience, desirable that they should have the power to try all classes of persons brought before them. Moreover, if this power is not conferred upon Native members of the Civil Service, the anomaly may be presented of a European Joint Magistrate, who is subordinate to a Native District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, being empowered to try cases which his immediate superior cannot try. Native Presidency Magistrates within the towns exercise the same jurisdiction over Europeans that they do over Natives, and there seems to be no sufficient reason why Covenanted Native Civilians, with the position and training of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should not exercise the same jurisdiction over Europeans as is exercised by other members of the Service.

4. For these reasons Sir Ashley Eden is of opinion that the time has now arrived when all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved of such restrictions of their powers as are imposed on them by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, or when at least Native Covenanted Civilians who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge should have entrusted to them full powers over all classes, whether European or Native, within their jurisdictions.

Jurisdiction over European British Subjects.

As the law now stands—Chapter VII of Act X of 1872 †—no Magistrate or Sessions Judge has jurisdiction to enquire into a complaint or to try a charge against a European British subject unless he is a Justice of the Peace and himself a European British subject. An exception to this rule is allowed within the limits of Presidency towns where, under Act IV of 1877, a Presidency Magistrate, whether himself a European or not, has the same jurisdiction over Europeans as over Natives of the country.

Previous to the passing of Act X of 1872 (the present Criminal Procedure Code) no Magistrate or Justice of the Peace, even though a European himself, had jurisdiction (outside the limits of the Presidency towns) to try a charge against any European British subject. But all Magistrates who were also Justices of the Peace had jurisdiction to enquire into charges against Europeans and to commit them to the High Court for trial. (See sections 39, 40 and 41 of Act XXV of 1861, the old Criminal Procedure Code). And by section 3, Act II of 1869, the Government was empowered to appoint any Covenanted Civil Servant to be a Justice of the Peace. Under Act X of 1872, however, a Covenanted Civil Servant, even though a first class Magistrate and a Justice of the Peace, would have no jurisdiction over a European British subject unless he himself is a European British subject.

This provision of the law would give rise to an invidious distinction and to many practical inconveniences in the case of those Natives of the country who in the course of time expect to attain to the position of a District Magistrate or of a Sessions Judge. Hence, when the Bill for Act X of 1872 was still before the Council, an amendment to section 72 in favour of the * See proceedings of the Governor General's Council on the Criminal Procedure Bill at a meeting held on the 16th April, 1872, published in the Supplement to the India Gazette of the 4th May 1872, page 572.

Native members of the Covenanted Service was proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. Ellis. The * amendment was put to the vote and lost by a majority of seven against five. But it is remarkable that the minority in that instance comprised the highest officials of the State. The President and Governor General, the Commander-in-Chief, the then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and his successor in office, all voted for the amendment, and I would humbly invite attention to the utterances of those dignitaries on that occasion. Nothing can be added to the eloquence or the sound reasoning of those speeches, and I shall content myself with appending a few extracts for ready reference.

The Bill of the new Criminal Procedure Code now before the Council † proposes to perpetuate the distinction noted above, and the disability under which myself and other Indian members of the Service labour. The arguments which were uttered in 1872 for its removal present themselves with redoubled force after an interval of ten years. They are too obvious to require mention, and they would lose all their grace and much of their force if repeated by one who is personally interested in the matter. My only sentiment on the subject is, that if you do entrust us with the responsible office of a District Magistrate or of a Sessions Judge, do not cripple us in our powers. The question affects seriously the efficiency of district administration; and I make bold to trust that the expediency of a change in the law cannot but be recognized if the matter be put before the Council in its present true light.

Since the passing of Act X of 1872, however, the constitution of the Civil Service has undergone an important change, with reference to which a few words need be said. Under a recent measure of Government, Natives of India have been appointed to the Covenanted Civil Service under a system of nomination and without the test of any competitive examination or a compulsory journey to England. This fact somewhat alters the aspect of the question discussed in the Council in 1872, and under existing circumstances stronger objections would probably be raised against any proposal to extend generally the criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects to all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service. I would therefore venture to make a suggestion which would probably meet the urgent requirements of the case, at the same time that it would obviate all reasonable objections and command a general assent. I would propose that the extension of jurisdiction over European British subjects be limited to Natives of the country holding the office of a Magistrate of the District or of a Sessions Judge.

B. L. GUPTA.

Extracts from speeches of the Members of the Legislative Council upon an amendment proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. Ellis to sections 72, 76 and 77 of the Bill for the present Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1872) at a meeting held on the 16th April 1872 (see Supplement to India Gazette of the 4th May 1872.)

The Hon'ble Mr. Ellis.—In making the invidious distinction which was now proposed, if we excluded any Justice of the Peace from the exercise of certain powers, we were really casting a stigma on the whole educated native population of India. He might also urge that there would be considerable inconvenience in having such a distinction. But he preferred to put it on the broad ground that, if you had Native Covenanted Civil Servants, you ought not to bar them from exercising the powers of a Civil Servant, among which powers is the jurisdiction of a Justice of the Peace over European British subjects. By Act II of 1869 natives might be appointed Justices of the Peace, and on what ground, he would ask, was it proposed to restrict their powers as Justice of the Peace?

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.—The Council should adhere to the decision which had been come to by the passing of Act II of 1869, namely, that a Justice of the Peace must be either a European British subject or a Covenanted Civil Servant. To re-open that question and to limit the powers that might be exercised by any Justices who were Covenanted Civil Servants, appeared to His Honour to be somewhat invidious, and would be, as it were, setting themselves against the policy hitherto pursued. Viewing the matter in that light, the should be inclined to vote for the motion before the Council.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief said that the native members of the Covenanted Civil Service having been to Europe, having become acquainted with the European feelings, ideas and customs, and having qualified themselves to take their places with the European members of the Civil Service, His Excellency would frankly accept them as real members of the Covenanted Civil Service, and allow them to exercise all the functions which the European members exercised.

His Excellency the President said that his vote would be given in conformity with the opinion which had been expressed by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. His Excellency thought that the restriction would embody a stigma on the Native community in general. It was equivalent to stating that under no circumstances, as far as the administration of the law was concerned, could the Native attain to that degree of impartiality and courage which would justify the Government in reposing in his hands the powers of trying European British subjects.

He thought that by the restriction we in effect said to the European—"You are not to be tried in the mofussil by the agency by which you are tried in the High Court and in the Courts of the Magistrates in the Presidency towns, with the general approval and sanction of the European and Native communities." It was saying in effect that the Native who had attained to the position of the Sessions Judge was not competent to try a European British subject, but that he might try him when he became a Judge of the High Court and sat beside a European Judge. His Excellency could not but help thinking that there was practically no greater disparity in permitting these Native Civil Servants to try a European British subject, than in permitting Native Justices in the Presidency towns to try him. There appeared to His Excellency to be no such broad distinction whatever between the conditions of the society and of public opinion in this respect between the Presidency towns and the mofussil. There were now a great number of public-spirited men and a great deal of public spirit all over the provinces. Communications by rail, the dissemination of newspapers both in English and the Vernacular, and a great variety of other circumstances had destroyed that distinction which formerly existed between the Presidency towns and the mofussil. His Excellency did not himself consider that there was the slightest possibility that in the rare case of a Civil and Sessions Judge trying a European British subject in the mofussil there would be an abuse of justice.

The Hon'ble Mr. Ellis.—But he desired to add his testimony to the efficiency with which Native Magistrates had performed their duties in the Presidency towns, in the administration of justice to both Europeans and Natives, and he had no hesitation in saying that they had performed their duties with as much credit and efficiency as the European Magistrates. And if they had done that, he saw no reason why Natives in the position of Covenanted Civil Servants or Sessions Judges should not be equally competent to administer justice to the European in the mofussil. His hon'ble friend, Mr. Stephen, had remarked that in this matter we were not to consult the feelings of the Judge, but of those who were to be subjected to the jurisdiction. In answer to that Mr. Ellis would say that he saw no reason why that which did not hurt the feelings of Europeans in the Presidency towns should hurt in the mofussil.

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.—After consideration, and having listened to the arguments, and given due weight to the weighty considerations which His Excellency the President had placed before the Council, His Honour was prepared to vote in favour of the very limited change which was proposed by the amendment.

The Hon'ble Sir Richard Temple.—He thought that the inference was undeniable that if the Natives were eligible to all the great offices of the administration, it seemed improper and unreasonable to say that they should not sit as Judges over Europeans in the mofussil for offences of the trivial nature over which it was proposed to give Justices of the Peace cognizance. After what had fallen from Hon'ble Member, he felt that he ought not to give a silent vote on the subject. He would vote in favour of the amendment of his hon'ble colleague, Mr. Ellis.

The question being put, the Council divided—

Ayes.

His Excellency the President.
His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.
His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.
Hon'ble Sir R. Temple.
Hon'ble Mr. Ellis.

Noes.

Hon'ble Mr. Strachey.
Hon'ble Mr. Stephen.
Major-General the Hon'ble H. W. Norman.
Hon'ble Mr. Inglis.
Hon'ble Mr. Robinson.
Hon'ble Mr. Chapman.
Hon'ble Mr. Stewart.

So the amendment was negatived.

To—The Secretaries to the Governments of Madras, Bombay, N.-W. P. and Oudh, Punjab; Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, British Burma, Coorg, Assam; and Resident at Hyderabad.

I am directed to forward for consideration the accompanying copy of a letter* from the Government of Bengal on the subject of the position of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, under those provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure which limit the jurisdiction to be exercised over European British subjects outside the presidency towns to judicial officers who are themselves European British subjects. It will be seen that, for the reasons set forth in paragraph 3 of this letter, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is of opinion that the time has arrived when all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved of such restrictions of their powers as are imposed by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code* of Criminal Procedure; or that at least Native covenanted civilians who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should be entrusted with full powers over all classes of persons, European or Native, within their jurisdictions. It is certainly anomalous that a Native member of the Civil Service holding the position of a District Officer should be debarred from taking up cases which his European Assistants may try and of which he himself, if appointed Presidency Magistrate, would have full power to dispose.

No. 329, dated 8th June 1882.

From—C. G. MASTER, Esq., Acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

In acknowledging your letter No. 7—586, dated 28th April 1882, on the subject of the position of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service in respect of criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the presidency towns, I am to transmit the accompanying minutes which have been recorded by the Members of Government on this important question.

2. It will be observed that while the Right Hon'ble the Governor and His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief are in favour of the proposed extension of jurisdiction, the Hon'ble Messrs. Hudleston and Carmichael have recorded minutes of dissent.

Minute by the Honourable D. F. CARMICHAEL, dated the 15th May 1882

It is not true, as stated by Mr. Gupta,* whose error is not noticed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, that, previous to the passing of Act X of 1872 (the existing Code of Criminal Procedure), no Magistrate, even though a British subject himself, had jurisdiction (outside the presidency town) to try a charge against a British subject. From the earliest days of British settlement in India, the Governor and his Council of every plantation, factory, or fort, had plenary criminal jurisdiction over British subjects. After this, as each Supreme Court was established, British subjects resident in India, even without the presidency towns, became amenable to those Courts only. This restriction proving very inconvenient was removed in the Company's charter of 1813, which empowered

S. cv—53, Geo. III, cap. 155.

District Magistrates—extended afterwards to all persons exercising full magisterial powers—to adjudicate all complaints preferred against any British subject of assaults or other injuries, not being felonies. So that for nearly sixty years before the present Code of Criminal Procedure came into force, the British Magistrate in the mufassal had pretty nearly the same authority which is given to him by that Code. The only considerable enlargement in the Code is the power given to a (British) mufassal Sessions Judge to deal with British subjects committed by the Magistrate, provided that no severer sentence than one year's imprisonment shall be inflicted on conviction.

2. It is important to notice Mr. Gupta's mistake, because, if we were going now for the first time to try British subjects in the mufassal, it would be difficult to defend the propriety of limiting the jurisdiction to British officials: but the case is different where it is proposed to legislate towards the forfeiture of an ancient privilege, dating perhaps—at any rate, this is the common superstition—from Magna Charta, which declares that no Englishman shall be condemned except per legale iudicium parium?

3. I observe from Mr. Gupta's extracts that Sir James Stephen's view of the matter was that this is eminently a case where we should consult the feelings of those who are to be subjected to the jurisdiction. I agree entirely to this. Before the Company's charter of 1833 the Government of India had not acquired the power of legislating as Mr. Gupta would desire. That statute gave them the power of investing the mufassal Courts with full criminal jurisdiction (the sentence of death excepted) over any of Her Majesty's natural-born subjects and the children of such subjects. Practically, however, except the petty jurisdiction given to a Sessions Court presided over by a British subject, in the present Code passed in 1872, nothing whatever has been done, and we know why it has not been done—the British Lion, a vulgar brute, no doubt, has wagged his tail and roared; that he would do so again now is, I think, pretty certain. To refuse the jurisdiction to the covenanted Native Magistrate is, I own, less defensible. He has lived some years in England, graduated at Oxford or Cambridge, and won his position by honourable competition with young English gentlemen. The members of the Civil Service receive him cordially; but 'Society' in India unfortunately does; we propose him at the Club where 'Society' blackballs him; and I fear the lower orders of the Briton in India are not prepared to accept him as one to be trusted with their personal liberty. If they accept the Native Magistrate in the presidency town, it is because there they are surrounded by thousands of public-spirited compatriots who, they are sure, would never allow them to be injured.

4. Lastly, I would observe that there is no little inconsistency about the treatment of this question at Calcutta. At one time it was enacted that, at all events, every British subject holding any of certain high judicial offices, ordinarily occupied by Natives, in the mufassal should be amenable to mufassal Courts for corruption in the exercise of such office. After some years this Act was repealed; and when during Lord Napier's Government here, the courts of the Travancore State convicted and punished a British subject, its treasurer, for fraud, an immense stir was made at the Foreign Office, and a law was quickly passed that no Native State could so proceed by inherent right or sovereignty, though the contrary practice had prevailed in Travancore for 35 years under the formal approval of the British Government. So at present, in Travancore, no Briton can be tried by a Magistrate who is not a Briton, and such Magistrate has no power at all till invested with it by the Governor General in Council. But if highly respectable Natives are to try Britons in British India, how can we refuse to let Natives of the same class do the same in Travancore territory, or in that of other civilised Native States?

5. After all, there is such a thing as privilege; this one is highly valued by those who possess it, and certainly does no harm to the Native population; while its surrender would, in my opinion, cause great exasperation, perhaps accompanied with much political mischief, amongst Her Majesty's natural-born subjects, their children and grandchildren, lawfully begotten, who now constitute the privileged class.

Minute by the Honourable W. HUDLESTON, dated the 16th May 1882.

I concur in opinion with my honourable colleague, Mr. Carmichael, that the proposed extension of jurisdiction would be impolitic, and is not expedient; and I would note that section 3, Act II of 1869, which empowers the Government of India and Local Governments to "appoint such and so many of the Covenanted Civil Servants of the Crown in India or other British inhabitants" to be Justices of the Peace in British India beyond the presidency towns (in which any persons not subjects of a foreign State may be so appointed), distinctly contemplated that the Covenanted Civil Servants would be British inhabitants. It was clearly not anticipated or perceived that the contrary might be the case.

2. The position in the presidency towns with their European population and Bar is essentially different from that of a mufassal Court, where, in this Presidency at least, the accused might very probably be the only European British subject within a circuit of 100 miles, and with all due recognition of the merits of the Native members of the Covenanted Service, I do not think the position would be a fair one. I am confident it would raise an outcry that would aggravate race friction far more than the removal of the already existing disability attaching to a small number of officials would allay it.

3. Mr. Gupta seems to me to wrongly assume that the nominated members of the Native Civil Service are members of the Covenanted Civil Service.

Minute by the Right Honourable M. E. GRANT-DUFF, Governor of Fort St. George, dated the 22nd May 1882.

I have read with great care and much respect the opinions of my honourable colleagues, Mr. Hudleston and Mr. Carmichael; but I cannot agree with them. It is, perhaps, a pity that a question was raised just now which affects so few people; but I see no answer to the claim made by Mr. Gupta which is logically defensible. It may be that to admit that claim may wake up bad passions, which are now slumbering; but I trust this will not be so. We cannot stop where we are, if pressed to advance, without stultifying our past action. Very soon, if not immediately, the Covenanted civilian of Native birth must be put on precisely the same footing as his European colleague. Mr. Gupta does not quite ask for this, in consequence of a misconception which Mr Hudleston has pointed out; but there is no safe standing ground till we take up that position.

Minute by His Excellency SIR FRED. ROBERTS, G.C.B., C.I.E., Commander-in-Chief, Fort St. George, dated the 23rd May 1882.

I agree with the remarks of His Excellency the Governor. I don't see how in equity any difference can be made in the position and power of British and Native covenanted civilians.

No. 4622, dated 28th July 1882.

From—H. F. ASTON, Esq., Acting Under-Secretary to the Govt. of Bombay, Judicial Department,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

In answer to your letter No. 7—587 of 28th April last, enquiring as to the opinion of this Government on the question whether Native covenanted civilians, or at least those of them who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should not be relieved of such restrictions as are imposed on their jurisdiction in relation to European British subjects by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, I am directed to state that, after consulting the higher judicial and magisterial officers in the Presidency on the question, and finding much diversity of opinion thereon, the Governor in Council has no hesitation in concurring with the preponderating opinion, which is to the effect that the disability of Native Judges and Magistrates in respect to the jurisdiction in question should certainly be removed from those Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service who attain to the position of District Magistrate and Sessions Judge.

No. 692, dated 27th May 1882.

From—The Officiating Secretary to Government, N.-W. P. and Oudh,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 7—588, dated 28th April 1882, on the subject of the position of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service under those provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure which limit the jurisdiction to be exercised over European British subjects outside the presidency towns to judicial officers who are themselves European British subjects.

2. The opinions of several officers of experience have been received and considered, and copy of a note recorded by Mr. Duthoit, D.C.L., Officiating Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, is forwarded for information.

3. The officers consulted are generally agreed that jurisdiction over European British subjects cannot any longer be withheld from Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service as a class. They are unanimous in thinking that when a Native member of the Service has risen to the position of a Magistrate of a district or of a Sessions Judge, it is imperative that he should exercise over European British subjects the same jurisdiction as is exercised by European members of the Service who are Magistrates of districts or Judges. There is, however, some difference of opinion as to the circumstances under which the jurisdiction in question should be given to Native members of the Civil Service who hold other offices than those above named. In the opinion of the majority of those consulted, it should be conferred on all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service who are possessed of the requisite judicial experience, and who have shown by their ability, judgment and strength of character, that they are fitted to exercise it. The Local Government would exercise its discretion as to the individual Native members of the Service upon whom the powers of a Justice of the Peace might be conferred. But the general statutory disability under which the Native Magistrates and Judges now labour ought, they think, to be removed.

4. Sir Alfred Lyall's views on the subject are briefly these. No European officer is appointed to be a Justice of the Peace, or Magistrate of a district or Sessions Judge, until he has been found to be, by experience and character, fitted to exercise the powers and perform the duties which are attached to these offices. During the period that ordinarily elapses before any officer can attain to the position of Magistrate of a District or Judge, or is appointed to be Justice of the Peace, ample opportunities are afforded of forming an opinion as to his qualifications for the offices in question; and he is not appointed to them if he has shown himself to be unfit to perform the duties and exercise the powers belonging to them. The interests of the European British subject and of the administration would, in Sir Alfred Lyall's opinion, be sufficiently provided for, if the general restriction, under which no one who is not himself a European British subject has jurisdiction over a European British subject, being removed, power be left with the Local Government to appoint as Justices of the Peace those Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service who have proved their fitness to exercise the jurisdiction. The Local Government would then apply the test of personal fitness to each particular case for Native, as well as for European, members of the Covenanted Civil Service.

5. On general principles of justice it must, Sir Alfred Lyall thinks, be admitted that the existing class differences between European and Native members of the same Service should be, as far as possible, removed. But so long as the special jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, and the special procedure for the trial of European British subjects, are retained in our laws (and the Lieutenant-Governor would not have them withdrawn hastily, or upon a side-issue), it is as reasonable and consistent to look specially to the qualifications of officers who are to use these exceptional powers. In these Provinces there has not yet been opportunity to form any very decided opinion about the character and qualifications of the Native members of the Service; and the time is still distant when it will be necessary to apply to the Native Civilian of these Provinces the test of personal fitness for the charge of a district, or for the post of Sessions Judge. On general grounds, however, Sir Alfred Lyall considers that the influences which are now brought to bear on Natives in the position of members of the Civil Service— influences arising from education and professional training, and from the responsibility that must necessarily fall upon them when placed on a level, and brought into comparison, with European officers, are rapidly rendering them as a class capable of exercising impartially the jurisdiction and judicial powers which are ordinarily exercised by European members of the Service.

6. It must, Sir Alfred Lyall thinks, be admitted that an officer who is appointed to be a District Magistrate should have jurisdiction over European British subjects. Inconveniences of various kinds would result if this jurisdiction were not enjoyed by every District Magistrate. A Native Covenanted Civilian, therefore, who is appointed to the charge of a district, ought to exercise this jurisdiction; for a Native Civilian, who may not be entrusted with the powers of a Justice of the Peace, is hardly fit to hold charge of a district. And if he as Magistrate of a district may be trusted to exercise the powers of a Justice of the Peace, he should retain them when, his charge of a district being temporary, he reverts to a subordinate post. For it would be unreasonable to let a restriction, in regard to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, operate so as to bring about the anomalous result that an officer, though considered fit to exercise certain powers when officiating as District Magistrate, is considered unfit to exercise them when he reverts to his former appointment.

7. Sir Alfred Lyall would therefore recommend that the Code of Criminal Procedure be so amended as to allow effect to be given to the views above expressed. Act II of 1869 has now been repealed, but section 22 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (X of 1882) forbids the Local Government to appoint any persons except European British subjects to be Justices of the Peace beyond the presidency towns. It would be necessary therefore to amend the section in such a manner as to allow Local Governments to appoint Native members of the Covenanted Service to be Justices of the Peace. It would be necessary in section 443 of the same Code to omit the words "and an European British subject"; in section 444 to omit all reference to European British subjects, and to repeal section 450. These amendments would enable the Local Government to carry out the views above expressed, whenever occasion might arise. In short, although the Lieutenant-Governor would not, for the present, advise that a Native Covenanted Civilian should be invested (save in very special cases) with the powers of a Justice of the Peace until he has been appointed, temporarily or permanently, to be Magistrate of a district, he would confer the powers of Justice of the Peace on every Native officer, whether a member of the Covenanted Civil Service or a commissioned civil officer in a non-regulation province, who may be appointed to be a Magistrate of a district.

Note by W. DUTHOIT, Esq., Officiating Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, dated Lucknow, the 19th May 1882.

There are, I suppose, two arguments in favour of restraining Natives of India from the exercise of jurisdiction in criminal trials over Europeans :—

I.—That, say what we may, the European is the dominant race in India, and as such is entitled to have its feelings considered and its prestige maintained :

II.—That it is doubtful whether, in the exercise of jurisdiction over Europeans, the Native judiciary would not be influenced by race prejudices.

There is, I think, much force in both these arguments.

As regards the former, I would remark that, go where we may in the East, we find that a claim to be judged by their peers is successfully asserted wherever Europeans are located in any numbers ; and that there is much point in Mr. Fitzjames Stephen's remarks (Supplement, Gazette of India, 4th May 1872, page 577)—"There is no country in the world, and no race of men in the world, from whom a claim to absolute identity of law for persons of all races and all habits comes with so bad a grace as from the natives of this country, filled as it is with every distinction which race, caste and religion can create, and passionately tenacious as are its inhabitants of such distinctions." But the time has, I think, come when these considerations may wisely be disregarded ; and I would not advocate the restriction of the powers of Native Covenanted Civilian upon an argument based upon mere sentiment. We have taken the Native into our most important governing body ; let us treat him loyally, and, as far as may be, trust him.

In the latter of the two arguments, however, I find a valid reason for not placing our Native brothers quite on the same platform with ourselves.

As Mr. Gupta has pointed out, we have now two classes of Covenanted Civilians,—the men who have entered the Service by competition in England and the men who have been appointed to it by the Viceroy in India.

These two classes of men must, I think, be treated differently.

The men of the former class will, from the circumstances of the case, be men who have in their own persons overcome the caste and religious prejudices into which they were born, and who are more or less au courant with European feelings and customs. Those of the latter class, on the contrary, may often be men saturated with caste and religious prejudices, and ignorant of European modes of thought and feeling. In his own person a man of the former class is likely to be as impartial a Judge as his European brother, and to influence from outside he would probably be almost equally inaccessible. But can we, for a long time at any rate, look for the same impartiality, the same inaccessibility to outside influences, in the latter class of men? I think not. We must not, I think, expect for some time to come to find in the latter class of men officers of higher intellectual capacity or greater strength of character than we have at present in our Native Uncovenanted and Honorary Magistrates of good family. I do not know what officers of the last-mentioned classes may be like in other parts of India; but I am certain that in these Provinces, they are not men who can be fully trusted to do even-handed justice as between their own countrymen of different religions, or between their own countrymen and Europeans. When I say this, I do not mean that they would be likely as a rule to press hardly upon the European; I think, on the contrary, that they would, as a rule, unduly favour the European; all that I mean is that, from my experience of them, I could not always trust them to hold the scales fairly. It is apt to be assumed that Native Civilians will make good Judges. I take leave to doubt whether more than a small minority of the men appointed for some years to come by the Governor General will ever be fit for judicial employment.

Things being so, I would make a distinction between the two classes of Native Civilians.

I would make it the rule, in default of special cause to the contrary, to appoint men of the former class (the men appointed in England by the Secretary of State) to be Justices of the Peace under Act II of 1869. I would only appoint men of the latter class (the men appointed in India by the Viceroy) to be Justices of the Peace after it had been fully ascertained that they are men fitted by strength of character and judicial ability to exercise high judicial functions.

Assuming the appointment of Native Civilians as Justices of the Peace to be restricted as above, I would meet the difficulty by omitting the words "and an European British subject" from between the words "first class" and the words "shall enquire" in section 443 of the new Code of Criminal Procedure; by substituting for the words "himself is an European British subject" in section 444 the words "is a Justice of the Peace" and by substituting for the words "an European British subject" in section 450 the words "a Justice of the Peace."

It will perhaps be objected to this proposal that it interferes with the theory upon which the system of appointment of Native Covenanted Civilians of the Viceroy—viz., that they should be treated in all respects as the Civilians sent out from England—is based. The objection is valid; but I would reply that as a fact the men appointed in India do not all of them come up to the standard of excellence which was propounded for them, and that the adoption of the proposal will not require an invidious distinction to be publicly made, but merely the laying down of a rule of practice to be privately observed by the Government of India and the Local Governments.

No. 703, dated 5th August 1882.

From—W. M. YOUNG, Esq., Secretary to the Government of the Punjab,
To—To the Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to acknowledge your letter No. 7—589, dated 28th April 1882, forwarding, for an expression of the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion, a copy of a letter from the Government of Bengal, recommending that all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved from such restrictions of their jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the presidency towns as are imposed by Chapter XXXIII of Act X of 1882, or that at least Native Covenanted Civilians, who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should be entrusted with full powers over all classes of persons, European or Native, within their jurisdiction.

2. In reply, I am to say that Sir Charles Aitchison entirely concurs in the arguments quoted in the enclosures of your letter from the Proceedings of the Legislative Council of 16th April 1872, and has little to add to them. His Honour considers that Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved from all restrictions and disqualifications imposed upon them under Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, Act X of 1882, by reason only of their not being European British subjects; and that such of them as may be from time to time appointed Justices of the Peace and Magistrates of the 1st class, or Sessions Judges, should be authorised by law to exercise all the powers and jurisdiction which a European British subject similarly appointed can exercise under that or any other Act.

3. Sir Charles Aitchison, moreover, is of opinion that the same powers ought to be conferred upon all Justices of the Peace and first class Magistrates, and upon all Sessions Judges, whether they are European or Native, and whether they belong to the Covenanted Civil Service or not. The powers and jurisdiction to be exercised by judicial officers should, His Honour thinks, depend entirely upon personal fitness, and in no respect upon race or service distinctions. It may be assumed that no one of any class will be appointed a Justice of the Peace or Magistrate of the 1st class or Sessions Judge who is not considered to possess the requisite qualifications, and the appointment ought, therefore, to carry with it all the usual powers and jurisdiction without regard to race, service, or creed. Under Act II of 1869, any British subject, whether European or Native, and whether belonging to the Covenanted Civil Service or not, may be made a Justice of the Peace, if he is considered properly qualified to act as such, and under section 5 of the Act, every such Justice of the Peace has power to commit European British subjects for trial before a proper Court, and to do all other acts which any Justice of the Peace may lawfully do; and this appears to Sir Charles Aitchison to be the broad and equitable principle which Government ought to follow. The restrictions introduced by the Code of Criminal Procedure upon the powers of Courts to enquire into and try charges against European British subjects, which rest exclusively on race distinctions, are, in His Honour's opinion, invidious and unnecessary. They are indeed a mere residuum of the time when Europeans were to a great extent under English law, with which Native Judges were not supposed to be acquainted, and should now be entirely abolished, having ceased to be defensible with the revision of the Codes.

From—A. H. L. FRASER, Esq., Offg. Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 7—590, dated 28th ultimo, regarding the position of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service under those provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure which limit the jurisdiction to be exercised over European British subjects outside the Presidency towns to judicial officers who are themselves European British subjects. The Chief Commissioner is of opinion that Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be placed in this respect on the same footing as European members of the same service, and should be relieved of such restrictions of their powers as are imposed by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure.

From—E. S. SYMES, Esq., Junior Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, British Burma,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 7—59, dated the 28th April, concerning the investiture of Native Civil Servants with power to try European British subjects within their jurisdiction.

I am to submit that, in the Chief Commissioner's opinion, it is desirable that Native Civil Servants should possess the same jurisdiction over European British subjects as is exercised by European Civil Servants. Native Civil Servants are and will usually be quite fit to exercise such jurisdiction.

European British subjects are liable to the jurisdiction of Asiatics in Upper Burma; and the Chief Commissioner does not apprehend that there would be any prolonged feeling against the change advocated by the Bengal Government among the better classes of Europeans in India.

No. 764, dated 26th May 1882.

From—C. J. LYALL, Esq., C.I.E., Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Assam,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your Circular No. 593T., dated the 28th ultimo, in which you ask for the opinion of the Chief Commissioner on the proposals made by His Honour the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, that all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved of such restrictions of their powers as are imposed by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, or that at least Native Covenanted Civilians who have attained the position of District Magistrate and Sessions Judge should be entrusted with full powers over all classes of persons, European or Native, within their jurisdictions.

2. In reply, I am to say that if the proposal had been to do away altogether with the distinction between European and Native Magistrates in this respect, Mr. Elliott would not have supported it. The distinction is no doubt open to the charge of being invidious, and rests to a large extent rather upon sentiment and prejudice than upon reason. But that such prejudice did exist in great strength some years ago is notorious; and now that the feeling has somewhat died out, the measures taken for introducing equality between the races should be gradual and tentative, in order to run no risk of re-awakening the antagonism which is passing away. It should not be forgotten, moreover, that besides the strong disinclination which would undoubtedly be felt by European British subjects in India to being made subject generally to the jurisdiction of Native Judges and Magistrates there are several practical reasons against that course which are not without great weight. An extensive conferment of these powers on Native Magistrates would involve the trial by them of Europeans in parts of the country where neither our police nor our jails are suited for dealing with such persons. The appearance of Europeans in Courts before a Native Magistrate, surrounded by Native amla, and guarded by Native police, accustomed only to deal with the generally tractable and (in the face of justice) submissive members of their own race, might easily lead to scandals in the administration of justice, which would be very regrettable, and which would, Mr. Elliott fears, by the excitement and agitation, which they would create, lead to exacerbation and strengthening of that popular prejudice and race antagonism, which it has taken a long course of years to soften and abate.

3. But while these considerations, in the Chief Commissioner's opinion, should forbid any extensive conferment of jurisdiction over Europeans upon Native judicial officers at present, he is quite at one with Sir Ashley Eden in regard to the limited proposal now put forward. He thinks that there is room and reason for a distinction between Native Civilians appointed in England by competition, and those Native members of the Covenanted Service who have been appointed by nomination in India. The former class should, in his opinion, be placed in every respect on an equality with their British-born brothers in the service, and permitted, like them, if appointed Justices of the Peace, to deal with cases in which Europeans are accused. In the case of Native Civilians appointed in India, who have not had their experience enlarged, and their education broadened by a visit to Europe, he would confine the extension of these powers to such of them as have attained the grade of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, and have also been appointed Justices of the Peace.

4. The Chief Commissioner does not think that this slight progress in the direction of equality is likely to excite any serious opposition on the part of the European community. The feeling which ten years ago it would have encountered is, he believes, gradually dying out; and the experience which is being acquired of the efficiency with which Native officers administer justice is by degrees undermining it. The extension of Native agency in the public service, and the increase of the influence of the Native voice in all political matters, are palpable facts, and the European settler is learning that he must reconcile himself to the march of events and accept the inevitable.

From—MAJOR H. WYLIE, C.S.I., Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Coorg,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

With reference to letter No. 7—592, dated the 28th ultimo, inviting the opinion of the Chief Commissioner of Coorg, regarding Native members of the Civil Service exercising jurisdiction over European British subjects, I am directed to state, for the information of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council, that Mr. Sandford is of opinion that the provisions of the present law of Criminal Procedure, which limit jurisdiction to try for criminal offences European British subjects to persons who are themselves European British subjects, are wise, and should, for political reasons, be maintained.

No. 345, dated 24th August 1882.

From—W. B. JONES, Esq., Resident at Hyderabad,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

Replying to your Circular No. 3—594 of 28th April last, I have the honour to submit in original, a letter in which the Commissioner, Hyderabad Assigned Districts, discusses the matter there referred. The Judicial Commissioner, who was also consulted, is of opinion that "the time may be considered to have arrived for extending to Natives who have qualified for the Civil Service, and who have attained the position of District Magistrate, or of Sessions Judge and Justice of the Peace, jurisdiction over European British subjects."

2. My own opinion is that such jurisdiction should be exercised by—

- (1) all Native members of the Civil Service who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge;
- (2) by such other Native members of the Civil Service as the Local Government may specially empower in this behalf.

3. It is scarcely necessary for me to state in detail the reasons which induce me to give my opinion in favour of the small relaxation of the present law which His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal suggests. The principle that a European British subject shall only be tried by one of his own class has the sanction of a long history behind it. I certainly should not be disposed to rest a recommendation for a departure from it on considerations of mere administrative convenience. All that can be said is that the reasons by which the general principle might be defended have, from the days when it was first asserted, until now, been gradually getting weaker, and that the reasons for the particular departure from the principle now proposed are the novel results of the altered circumstances of the Civil Service, and of India generally, and that, to use the Judicial Commissioner's expression, "the time has come" when the change ought to be made. It will be a small change in itself, but it will be an act of justice to those Natives of India whom we invite to take their places by our side as civil administrators, and will add one to the numerous measures which of late years have tended to bridge over the separation between Englishmen and their Indian fellow subjects, which began when, assuming the Dewani of Bengal, we constituted ourselves the sole civil administrators of the country.

4. I will only add that, while the proposed change appears to me to be demanded of us, as a measure of justice to Native members of the Civil Service, and of reasonable concession to general Native opinion, I cannot believe that it can be regarded by intelligent Europeans with serious dislike. In days when the interior of India was reached with difficulty, when no press, railways, telegraphs or bar existed, when Native Magistrates were untrained and unacquainted with European habits and feelings, an Englishman almost alone in an up-country district might with reason apprehend that he would not always obtain an impartial trial before a Native Magistrate. All this is now changed, and a claim which was formerly grounded on a reasonable apprehension, can, it seems to me, when concession is limited, as it is proposed to limit it, rest on little besides unreasonable class prejudice.

No. 32A., dated 1st June 1882.

From—A. P. HOWELL, Esq., Commissioner, Hyderabad Assigned Districts,
To—The Secretary for Berar to the Resident at Hyderabad.

I have the honour to acknowledge your No. 319J., of the 8th instant, forwarding for opinion a letter from the Government of Bengal, with enclosure, relative to the jurisdiction to be exercised by Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service over European British subjects.

2. The Lieutenant-Governor is of opinion that the time has now arrived when all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service should be relieved of such restrictions of their powers as are imposed on them by Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, or when "at least Native Covenanted Civilians, who have attained the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should have entrusted to them full powers over all classes, whether European or Native, within their jurisdictions. The grounds of this opinion are (1) that it is right, as a matter of general policy, that Covenanted Native Civilians should be empowered to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans as well as Natives; and (2) that it will be a matter of administrative convenience for Natives to exercise such powers, otherwise the anomaly might occur of a European Joint Magistrate, who is subordinate to a Native District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, being empowered to try cases which his immediate superior cannot try. It is added that as Native Presidency Magistrates within the presidency towns exercise the same jurisdiction over Europeans that they do over Natives, therefore there is no reason why Covenanted Native Civilians, with the position and training of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, should not exercise the same jurisdiction over Europeans as is exercised by other members of the service. These views are expressed upon a note by Mr. Gupta, of the Bengal Civil Service, representing the anomalous position in which Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service are placed by Chapter VII of the old Code, which is reproduced in Chapter XXXIII of the present Code.

3. The first point that occurs to me is, that the case is, unintentionally no doubt, very unfairly and incompletely stated by Mr. Gupta. He refers to the discussion of 1872, and says that nothing can be added to the eloquence or the sound reasoning of those who argued then in favour of the view which he advances now. He adds that the arguments of 1872 in favour of his view present themselves with redoubled force in 1882, and that "they are too obvious to require mention." Still he does mention them, and at length, in skilfully arranged "extracts for ready reference," and then he gives a reason, due to a recent but "important change" in the constitution of the Covenanted Civil Service, why there is admittedly less force in those arguments now than there was ten years ago.

4. To this I reply that if the arguments in favour of Mr. Gupta's view are all that they are represented to be, how is it that they were in the minority in 1872? Mr. Gupta attempts to make a point in the composition of that minority, but when I find Sir J. Stephen and Sir John Strachey voting on the same side, and that side the majority, it is idle to say that the arguments against which they voted are "too obvious to require mention." Mr. Gupta cites the authority of the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal (Sir George Campbell), who voted with the minority, but Mr. Gupta fails to notice in his extract, or even to allude to Sir George Campbell's admission, that he seldom had greater doubt and difficulty in making up his mind, and that when he did vote for the amendment, it was on the express ground that "it appeared to His Honour that what was now proposed was a minimum of change." It was not proposed to impose upon the European public the general liability to be tried by Native Magistrates, but only the possibility of being placed under the jurisdiction of three or four Natives who had qualified themselves for admission into the ranks of the Covenanted Civil Service, and who, under the existing law, might be 'Justices of the Peace.' What then was Sir J. Stephen's argument? I give it, as Mr. Gupta gives the opposite views, in extracts: "In countries situated as most European countries are, it is no doubt desirable that there should be no personal laws; but in India it is otherwise. Personal, as opposed to territorial, laws prevail here on all sorts of subjects, and their maintenance is claimed with the utmost pertinacity by those who are subject to them. The Muhammadan has his personal law. The Hindu has his personal law. Women who, according to the custom of the country, ought not to appear in Court, are excused from appearing in Court. Natives of rank and influence enjoy, in many cases, privileges which stand on precisely the same principle; and are English people to be told that, whilst it is their duty to respect all these laws scrupulously, they are to claim nothing for themselves? that whilst the English Courts are to respect, and even to enforce a variety of laws which are thoroughly repugnant to all the strongest convictions of Englishmen, Englishmen who settle in this country are to surrender privileges to which, rightly or otherwise, they attach the highest possible importance? I can see no ground or reason for such a contention. I think there is no country in the world, and no race of men in the world from whom a claim for absolute identity of law for persons of all races and all habits comes with so bad a grace as from the Natives of this country, filled as it is with every distinction, which race, caste and religion can create, and passionately tenacious as are its inhabitants of such distinctions.

"It may be replied that to use this argument is to desert the characteristic principles of English government, and to make a point against an antagonist by surrendering what we ourselves believe. My answer is, that the general principle that all persons should be subject to the same laws is subject to wide exceptions, one of which covers this case. It is obvious enough; but possibly the best way of stating it will be to show how it applies to the particular matter before us. The English people established by military force a regular system of government, and, in particular, a regular system for the administration of justice, in this country, in the place of downright anarchy. The system of administering justice was, and is, beyond all question, infinitely better than any system which the English people found here; but it neither is, nor can be, the English system.

"It must of necessity differ from it in its characteristic features; and, although I am not one of those who blindly admire the English system of criminal justice, I say that, if English people in India like it, which they notoriously do, they have a perfect right to have it."

Again:—"The privilege as to jurisdiction is the privilege of the prisoner, not the privilege of the Judge. The European had an objection to be tried by the Native. Considering the position in which he stood, the question was, whether you would put him in a position in which he did not at present stand. You placed no slight upon the Native by saying that he could only try a man of his own race. What was there against the feelings of the Native in saying that? Why should any one feel a slight, because he was told that this particular man was to be tried in a particular way? On the other hand, it was a feeling, and not an unnatural one, that a man should wish to be tried by his own countrymen."

I think Mr. Gupta would have strengthened his case had he explained what is the answer now to Sir J. Stephen's arguments which commanded a majority ten years ago. Logically it would seem that as long as we have personal law in the country, as long as women and privileged Natives are excused from appearing in our Courts, as long as the European British subject has any rights and privileges under the law, so long should the present law, as to the Judge before whom the European British subject must be tried, be maintained. I submit that when a European discusses the question, he is exposed to the converse difficulty of that urged by Mr. Gupta, on the score of being personally interested, and that he is likely to be deceived by the false glamour of liberality attaching to his adoption of Mr. Gupta's view, which ought not, however, to obscure the real issue whether, under the circumstances of India, the European British subject should be deprived of the one privilege of personal law which he most values. The question is by no means so obvious as Mr. Gupta represents. I believe that the majority of non-official Europeans would answer it still as Sir H. Norman did, "He had the highest regard for the natives of the country, and particularly for those who had attained the very important position of a Magistrate of the first class; but looking to the peculiarities of our position here, and to the great differences of character between Natives and Europeans, he thought it was undesirable to allow the trial of European British subjects by Natives in the mufassal."

5. As to the arguments urged by the Government of Bengal, the first simply and admittedly begs the whole question on which Sir J. Stephen and Sir H. Norman took their stand. As for the second argument, based on administrative convenience, the question is, how often would such cases be likely to arise, and whether, if they did, the inconvenience would be so frequent, or of such consequence, as to supply an answer to the arguments of Sir J. Stephen and Sir H. Norman, which, I submit, are just as strong now as ever they were. In any case the plea of anomaly has far less force in India than elsewhere. Surely, too, it might be argued that Natives and Europeans are not on the same footing in fact in many ways, and that the law recognises this fact; that there must be some differences in the position of the European British subject from that of the Native, and that the law recognises these differences, and that the nationality of the Judge is no more invidious or special than the composition of the jury.

6. In conclusion, then, if I am asked for an opinion about a clause in a law which, although only just passed, and not yet actually in force, is considered by a high authority already to require to be amended in an important particular, I would admit that there is enough force in the plea urged by Mr. Gupta, and supported by the Bengal Government, to warrant a reconsideration of the question decided in the Legislative Council on the 4th May 1872. I go further and think that the point should be raised and discussed now, because in 1872 many of the speakers were hampered by pledges or quasi-pledges which prevented the question being really decided on its merits. And as to the merits of the question, I would say that it is no doubt desirable that there should be no personal laws, but that, in my humble opinion, the whole question of personal law should be considered together, and not the single point raised by Mr. Gupta. And if the question be raised, the decision should be final, for we cannot always expect the same serenity in the political horizon which we enjoy at present.

I append the replies of the Deputy Commissioners of Buldana and Amraoti, who were consulted on the subject.

In my opinion the time has certainly come when Native members of the Civil Service who have been made District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, should be entrusted with full powers over all classes, European or Native, within their jurisdiction.

AMRAOTI,
27th May 1882.

A. TULLOCH,
Deputy Commissioner.

I am of opinion that the invidious distinction should be abolished, or that an understanding should be arrived at under which Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service would be held to be disqualified for office as Sessions Judges or Magistrates of the District. I quite agree with Mr. Gupta, that if you entrust them with these responsible offices, you ought not to cripple their powers.

There is, however, no force in so much of the argument as is based on the fact that Native Presidency Magistrates and High Court Judges already have jurisdiction over Europeans. They are exposed to a publicity that renders their position exceptional. Mr. Gupta himself seems inclined to make distinction between Native Covenanted Civilian who have been trained in England and those who have not, and I think he does so rightly. I am therefore inclined to believe that the latter class of civilians should not hold office as Sessions Judges or Magistrates of Districts. In other words, I would make the experiment under restricted conditions, and confine the exercise of jurisdiction over Europeans to Native Civilian who have been trained in England.

Deputy Commissioner.

A Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects; X of 11
Preamble. It is hereby enacted as follows:—

“Sessions Judges and District Magistrates are Justices of the Peace within and for the whole of the territories administered by the Local Government under which they are serving.”

Amendment of section 443. 3. In section 443, the words “and an European British subject” shall be omitted.

New section substituted for section 444. 4. For section 444 the following shall be substituted:—

“444. An Assistant Sessions Judge shall not exercise jurisdiction over an European British subject, unless he has held the office of Assistant Sessions Judge for at least three years, and has been specially empowered in this behalf by the Local Government.”

Assistant Sessions Judges who may try European British subjects.

Proposed by Mr. George Irving, seconded by the Hon'ble J. E. Caithness—

"That this Association, in view of the recent public demonstrations of feeling and opinion on this subject on the part of Her Majesty's European British subjects throughout the country, and the representations already made to the Government, feel it to be needless to submit, in respect thereof, a separate memorial; it desires, therefore, that copies of the Resolutions passed at this meeting be forwarded to the Secretary to the Government of India in the Legislative Department, with a letter signed by all the members of the Association, for submission to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council as an unanimous expression of the views of the Association, and of its respectful protest against the proposed alteration of the present law of Criminal Procedure, being Act X of 1882."

Carried unanimously.

The Meeting then closed.

No. 31, dated 8th March 1883.

From—The Hon'ble KRISTODAS PAL, C.I.E., Secretary to the British Indian Association,
To—The Additional Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I have the honour to forward, herewith, a joint memorial of several Native Associations to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council regarding the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, and request the favour of your laying the same before His Excellency in Council.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council.

The joint memorial of the British Indian Association, the Indian Association, the Muhammadan Literary Society, the National Muhammadan Association, the East Bengal Association and the Vakils' Association, High Court, Calcutta.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists regard with feelings of deep satisfaction and thankfulness the introduction into Your Excellency's Council of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, with a view to remove the judicial disqualification of race in the trial of European British subjects in criminal cases, as a step in advance towards the establishment of that equality in the eye of the law without the invidious distinction of country, race or religion, which is the just pride of British jurisprudence and polity, and the guiding principle of British rule in India.

That your memorialists have noticed with regret a statement to the effect that the Native community do not care for this measure. It is utterly unfounded. However limited the scope of the present Bill may be, the principle on which it is based is just, sound and righteous, and meets with their entire approval.

That your memorialists had originally intended to convene a public meeting, as the constitutional mode of procedure in matters of this kind, in order to give an emphatic contradiction to the statement noticed above; but remembering how apt is such a demonstration to lead to a display of passions and feelings, and to stir up race animosities and antipathy, which none can regret more than your memorialists do, they have thought fit to approach Your Excellency in Council on the subject in this form. Your memorialists have too high a regard for the non-official European community of India, and too keen a sense of the services they have rendered, by promoting the material advancement and contributing to the political education of the people of this country, to take any steps that, though perfectly lawful and constitutional, may have the effect of embittering feelings and setting class against class.

That relying on the wisdom, justice and liberality of Your Excellency's Government, and of Her Majesty's Government in England, and on the noble principles which actuate the great British nation in the government of peoples of many races and religions, which owe allegiance to the British Crown, your memorialists feel confident that Your Excellency in Council will not allow any clamour, taunt or threat, based on mistaken and prejudiced notions, to interfere with the progress and due enactment of this just and righteous measure.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Dated 6th March 1883.

From—H. W. I. WOOD, Esq., Secretary to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

By desire of the Hon'ble the Sheriff of Calcutta, I have the honour to forward, for submission to the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Governor General of India, copies, hereto annexed, of Resolutions adopted at a public meeting of the European community held at the Town Hall of this City on Wednesday, the 28th of last month, relative to the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872 so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Resolutions adopted at a Public Meeting held at the Town Hall on the 28th February 1883.

FIRST RESOLUTION.—Proposed by J. J. J. Keswick, Esq., seconded by J. H. A. Branson, Esq., supported by W. Bleack, Esq.

That in the opinion of this meeting the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code is unnecessary in the interests of justice; uncalled for by any administrative difficulty; based on no sound principle; founded on no experience, whilst forfeiting a much-valued and prized and time-honoured privilege of European British subjects; it confers no benefit upon Natives, whilst imperilling the liberties of European British subjects; it in no way affords any additional protection to Natives; it will deter the investment of British capital in the country by giving rise to a feeling of insecurity as to the liberties and safety of the European British subjects employed in the mufassal and also of their wives and daughters; and it has already stirred up on both sides a feeling of race antagonism and jealousy, such as has never been aroused since the mutiny of 1857.

SECOND RESOLUTION.—Proposed by J. Pitt-Kennedy, Esq., seconded by W. H. Pratt, Esq., supported by J. G. Apcar, Esq.

That memorials of protest be drawn up, and circulated for signature in Bengal and other Provinces; and, when duly signed, be presented to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council and to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India; and that the Sheriff be requested to sign the same on behalf of this meeting.

That petitions for the protection of the rights, privileges and liberties of Her Majesty's European British subjects be drawn up and circulated for signature in like manner, and, when duly signed, presented to both Houses of Parliament.

THIRD RESOLUTION.—Proposed by J. Murdoch, Esq., seconded by D. Cruickshank, Esq., supported by the Revd. H. Finter.

That a committee be formed consisting of the following gentlemen:—Messrs. Keswick, Flemington, Thomas, A. B. Miller, Apcar, Branson, Ezra, Gubboy, Finter, Madge, Murdoch and Cruickshank, with power to add to their number, for the purpose of preparing the memorials and petitions in terms of the last resolution.

*To His Excellency the Most Honourable the MARQUIS OF RIPON, K.G., P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E.
Viceroy and Governor-General of India in Council.*

The memorial of the European British-born subjects of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress and Employés of the East Indian Railway Company.

MOST HUMBLY AND RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists have read with much concern the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill which was introduced into your Excellency's Council by the Hon'ble Mr. Ilbert on the 2nd February 1883, by which it is sought to invest Native Civil Servants with jurisdiction over European British subjects in criminal cases.

2. That your memorialists humbly submit that they have a constitutional right to be tried only by their peers and their country, and that in India they have always enjoyed the right of being tried by men of their own nationality, and have done nothing whatever to forfeit that right.

3. That, although the Natives of India have by force of conquest become subjects of the British Crown, they are, nevertheless, still aliens both in nationality and religion; and a European British subject appearing before a Court presided over by a Native Magistrate or Judge would be essentially before a foreign tribunal, without the advantage of that Consular protection which he would be entitled to in a foreign country.

4. That, in the humble opinion of your memorialists, the proposed amendment of the existing law is not only inopportune, but is calculated to engender class feeling and race antagonism, which your memorialists, who are collaborators with a very large number of Native Railway employés, cannot too strongly deprecate as being injurious in the extreme to European and Native alike and to the public service generally.

5. That your memorialists would draw your attention to the fact that no dissatisfaction has been expressed by the native community generally on the subject of the immunity from native jurisdiction now enjoyed by European British subjects, and that none of their privileges have been affected by the existing order of things. In proof that the present law, as a piece of class legislation, has been a success, and that cases coming under it should be enquired into and tried by trained European Magistrates, your memorialists beg to quote the opinion expressed by the Honourable the Legal Member of Council at the meeting of your Excellency's Council on the 2nd ultimo, in which he said—"and as to the facts with which we have to deal, no one who has studied the statistics and reports of the cases involving charges against European British subjects can fail to be struck with two things: first, that, as compared with the great mass of ordinary criminal business, they are exceptionally rare, and, secondly, that they are exceptionally troublesome and difficult."

6. That your memorialists, as Railway employés, are more likely to be injuriously affected by the proposed change in the law in respect of jurisdiction over European British subjects than other classes of the European community: first, on account of, in many cases, their isolation at stations far removed from European centres and Courts of revisional jurisdiction; and, secondly, owing to the great amount of technical and scientific evidence that is usually introduced into railway criminal cases, and which would be almost, if not quite, unintelligible to a Native Magistrate. A protracted trial, with all the heavy expenses attendant thereon, followed probably by an erroneous and perhaps ruinous judgment, might therefore, not unreasonably, be expected from the Judge's want of technical knowledge and experience in subjects with which European Judges are all more or less familiar. To illustrate the possible vexatious action of a Native Magistrate in a railway criminal case, your memorialists feel that they cannot do better than quote an instance which recently occurred in which the presiding Magistrate was a Native.

On the 19th November 1882, a collision occurred in the Howrah yard, and on the 22nd a line jamadar was prosecuted for carelessness in connection therewith before a Native Magistrate. The jamadar admitted his guilt, and formal evidence only was necessary to summarily dispose of the case; but the Magistrate, after recording some evidence, postponed the case until the 24th idem. When the case was resumed some technical evidence was tendered and rejected, and the trial was then postponed until the following morning at 8-30 o'clock for a local investigation. At the appointed hour ten Railway employés, European and Native, attended in the goods yard but the Magistrate did not come, and, after waiting in the yard at much inconvenience to the traffic and themselves until 12-30 p.m., they were all summoned by a court messenger to the court-house, only to be informed on their arrival there that the Magistrate had left, but that he would be in the yard at 2-30 p.m. Again the ten witnesses returned to the goods yard and had to wait there until dark, when a messenger arrived at 5-30 p.m. and said that the Magistrate could not come. Two days after this, notice was received that the case would come on for trial on the 29th November, but the Magistrate did not attend the yard until 4-30 p.m., and again postponed the case until the 4th December. The ten European and Native witnesses duly appeared on the latter date, but only one of them was called to give some slight formal evidence and, then, after all these adjournments, the prisoner was convicted on his own plea of "guilty."

7. That your memorialists, whilst fully and cordially recognizing the right of Natives to a share in the administration of the laws of this country, beg to point out that the proposed amendment, if it becomes law, will place European British subjects at a positive disadvantage when compared with the mass of the population of India. An INDIAN British subject will enjoy the high privilege of being tried by his countrymen or by European Magistrates who have been specially selected, educated and trained for the Indian Civil Service, and who have taken up their fixed residence in India; but EUROPEAN British subjects will be under the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Judges, whose ideas of western civilisation, manners and thought will have been gained only in India, or during two or three years' study in England, instead of their being subject, as at present, only to the jurisdiction of highly trained and educated Englishmen, who, being of their own nationality, have an intimate knowledge of their inner life, habits and manners.

8. That your memorialists would draw attention to the fact that a Native Magistrate of any class can exercise, under section 445 of the Criminal Procedure Code, nearly, if not all, the powers which a Justice of the Peace can exercise in England, inasmuch as he can issue process of arrest, making it returnable to himself or to any other Magistrate having jurisdiction.

9. That your memorialists would deprecate any argument founded on the basis that because Natives exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects in Presidency-towns, they should therefore exercise that jurisdiction outside Presidency-towns, as obviously misleading, seeing that the respective positions are widely different. In a Presidency-town any high-handed proceeding of a Magistrate would not of necessity imperil the liberty of the subject, as an immediate application could be made to the High Court and suspensory writ obtained within an hour; but in the Mofussil the European British subject would be entirely at the mercy of the local native authority, and would be liable to be degraded by actual confinement in an Indian gaol, perhaps with hard labour, in a most deleterious climate, before a distant High Court could be moved by the most energetic advocate to suspend a sentence which might ultimately prove to be unwarranted by law.

10. That your memorialists, in conclusion, would respectfully submit that the protection which has hitherto been afforded them by the existing law is no more than they are entitled to under the British Constitution, and, as Muhammadans, Hindus, Parsis, and many other races and sects in India are protected in the exercise of their own peculiar laws and customs by class legislation, your memorialists pray that the rights and liberties so dear to them, and which are menaced by the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, may not be withdrawn.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

To—The Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department.

At a Special General Meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, held on Wednesday, the 21st of last month, resolutions were adopted with reference to the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects; and I am desired to forward copies thereof, hereto annexed, with the request that the same be submitted to the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Governor General of India.

Resolutions passed at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce held on the 21st February, 1883.

Resolution.—Proposed by J. J. J. Keswick, Esq., seconded by James Murdoch, Esq.,—

That in the opinion of this meeting the alteration of the law proposed by the Government in the Bill entitled “A Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882 so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects”, calls for the unqualified disapproval of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and should be opposed to the utmost by every means in its power.

Second Resolution.—Proposed by J. W. O’Keefe, Esq., seconded by J. P. Thomas, Esq.,—

That a Sub-Committee of this Chamber be appointed to draw up a memorial to Government protesting against the Bill, and to take steps to procure signatures to the memorial throughout every district.

Third Resolution.—Proposed by the Hon’ble R. Miller, seconded by E. E. Bigge, Esq.,—

That the following members of the Chamber be invited to form the Sub-Committee for the foregoing purpose:—

J. J. J. Keswick, Esq., D. Cruickshank, Esq., J. Murdoch, Esq., J. Flemington, Esq., A. G. Watson, Esq., F. Aitchison, Esq., with power to add to their number.

Fourth Resolution.—Proposed by R. A. Turnbull, Esq., seconded by J. J. Guise, Esq.,—

That this Chamber confer with the Chambers of the Bombay and Madras Presidencies, so as to have united action against the Bill.

Dated 5th March, 1883.

From—C. B. WESTERHOUT, Esq., Chaplain of Ghaziabad,

To—The Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department.

I have the honour to forward, herewith, a memorial signed by the residents of Ghaziabad, for the favourable consideration of His Excellency the Viceroy and Council, on the subject of the proposed Criminal Procedure Bill.

To His Excellency the Viceroy, President, and the Honourable Members of the Legislative Council for India.

The petition of the European British subjects of Ghaziabad, in the District of Meerut—

HUMBLY SHOWS,—That your petitioners view with extreme apprehension and alarm the introduction of the Bill for giving jurisdiction to Native Magistrates over European British subjects.

2. That, so far as your petitioners are aware, the only reason assigned for depriving them of a privilege which they have always been accustomed to look upon as a birthright, and which they most highly prize, is one of sentiment, and that in favour of a class of persons who themselves, as remarked by Sir FitzJames Stephen, have numerous privileges which are not accorded to your petitioners; e.g., the exemption of parda nishin women from attendance in Civil Courts.

3. That the Honourable Member who introduced the Bill could not but admit that the present law had worked well; that the number of cases against European British subjects were few; and the existing qualified Magistrates quite sufficient to deal with them; and that the nature of the cases were such as required their determination by Magistrates of some experience and tried abilities. All these reasons, your petitioners submit, are in favour of making no alteration in the law as it is at present.

4. That the two principal reasons assigned for the proposed alteration, are—

1st.—The invidious position of Native Magistrates who are members of the Civil Service.

2nd.—The fact that the existing law is founded on a compromise.

Your petitioners would remark, as to the former, that it is no grievance, and that a mere sentimental feeling, so far as your petitioners are aware, has never been considered a sufficient reason for depriving a class of persons of privileges which they highly prize, when such privileges work no injury to the non-privileged members of the community. Your petitioners would here remark that the same reason would apply for conferring the jurisdiction on all Native Magistrates of the first class.

As to the latter, your petitioners would beg to point out that it is this compromise which has conferred the present extended jurisdiction on Mufassal Magistrates and Sessions Judges. Prior to the Criminal Procedure Code, 1872, no European British subject could have been sentenced to imprisonment, however short, by a Mufassal Magistrate or Sessions Judge except for non-payment of a fine.

5. Your petitioners respectfully beg to point out how impossible it is for them to have any confidence in the Native Magistracy, when they are fully aware that the Natives themselves have no such confidence; and would, in all cases, prefer being tried by European Magistrates.

6. That the effect of the mere introduction of the Bill into Council has been to embitter the feelings between European British subjects and Natives. Your petitioners cannot do better in support of this allegation than refer to the article in the Amrita Bazar Patrika* quoted at length by the Englishman.

7. Finally, your petitioners would submit, that the state of native society is such as to make the appearance of an European woman before a Native Magistrate a disgrace to her; and especially in the eyes of the Natives themselves.

Your petitioners therefore pray that your Excellency in Council will be pleased to take this petition into your favourable consideration and to reject the Bill.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

To the Right Hon'ble the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The Humble Memorial of the Anglo-Indian and European British subjects residing at Mirzapur in Upper India—

SHEWETH,—That your memorialists have learnt with surprise and alarm that a Bill has been introduced into the Legislative Council of India, having for its object the conferring, for the first time in the history of India, upon Natives of India, of criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects residing in the Mufassal.

2. Your memorialists have also learnt with surprise that the Government of India has given its sanction to this innovation in the law of India without being subjected to the slightest pressure proceeding from the Natives of India; that it has, of itself, thus raised this grave question of race antagonism, and that it bases its action principally on the ground that a large proportion of Covenanted Civilians—i.e., Lieutenant-Governors, Commissioners and other salaried officials who have little or no stake in the permanence of British rule in India, and who can have very few more years to reside in India,—after being informed of the Governor General's opinion of the measure, have expressed themselves to be in favour of the same.

3. Your memorialists further notice with regret that the Government of India entirely failed to seek for any expression of opinion regarding this measure from either those European British subjects residing permanently in the Mufassal, whose lives and fortunes depend on the security of life and property in the Mufassal—the persons likely to be affected in their personal safety by measures of this kind—or the great body of English merchants, planters, traders and others, both in England and in this country, being those who are likely to suffer by depreciation in the value of their property.

4. Though your memorialists are as strongly impressed as any one can be of the desirability of extending the principle of equality in the judicial administration of India, where it can be done with safety and without disturbance, yet, considering the disproportion in numbers of Natives and Europeans in India, especially of Europeans residing in the Mufassal (about one to 5,000 Natives), your memorialists are as strongly persuaded that the principle of equality is not applicable in the present state of India, and that Natives, especially those in the Mufassal, are unprepared for, and will entirely misunderstand and misapprehend the announcement that Europeans are now by law liable to be punished by the Native Magistracy.

5. Your memorialists are also strongly convinced that no change in the law is necessary or expedient, and they most earnestly deprecate any further attempts on the part of those Europeans in India, whose power is great, but whose presence is temporary and not permanent, to encourage the Natives of India to agitate for positions in the administration and government of India on the principle of equality, while the following indisputable facts exist, namely:—

- (a) The Natives of India are admittedly subject races; bearing the greatest enmity and animosity towards each other; dependant on European soldiers to keep the peace; and, except an insignificant number of individuals in the Presidency-towns (who owe everything to compulsory education and contact with Europeans), are wholly unfit for independence.
- (b) They have, unquestionably, more of liberty, peace and protection than any other people in the world who are subject to foreign domination.
- (c) They already stand equal before the law; subject to the same Penal and Civil Codes as the dominant race.

- (d) They have the benefit of personal laws to a greater extent than Europeans—Natives of rank and women being exempted from attendance in Courts of Justice.
- (e) The number of Europeans in India are comparatively so small that to admit and enforce the principle of equality without reservation and without considerations of race or feeling in every department would reduce British power in India to a cypher, and make the British occupation of India unmaintainable, and eventually produce the same state of anarchy and disorder that prevailed before its conquest by the British.
- (f) The principle of equality has no application among the Natives themselves, as their domestic and social institutions prove.

6. Your memorialists further submit that, with so many indications present in the minds of the people of India, namely:—

- (a)—of their acknowledged unfitness for independence or self-government;
- (b)—of their (with few exceptions) acknowledged unfitness to exercise jurisdiction over the liberty and lives of even their own fellow-countrymen;
- (c)—of the necessity for excluding them from exercising any power except under proper safeguards;
- (d)—of the necessity for excluding them from appointments in the Army, and taking part in the defence of their country against disturbers of the Pax Britannica;

to propose to grant them the principle of equality to the extent of permitting them to sit in judgment upon members of the dominant race seems to your memorialists residing in the Mufassal an unnecessary and dangerous innovation, which for many generations to come your memorialists (speaking on behalf of their wives and children) will never calmly acquiesce in or submit to.

7. Your memorialists unhesitatingly aver that should this Bill pass (which has already been spoken of by the Native papers as “an instalment” of what is to follow), there will be no adequate security or safety for your memorialists and European residents in the Mufassal, and the present peaceful state of India will, on the punishment of a European by a Native, be liable to disturbances of such a character as, if once set on foot, will produce greater anarchy and disorder than has been known in India for centuries.

8. Your memorialists would further observe that they perceive in this Bill, in which the principle of equality is affirmed, the prelude to others of a similar character calculated to destroy British interests in, and exclude Europeans from, Mufassal India. That if such is the ultimate aim and policy of the Government of India, your memorialists submit that the same should be boldly announced, and notified to your memorialists and the thousands of Europeans entering into and settling in the country.

Your memorialists therefore pray—

- (1) that they may be heard by Counsel against the passing of this Bill;
- (2) that the Bill may be thrown out;
- (3) that the Bill, if passed, may be limited to Bengal, or places where residents will have the protection of European public opinion and the press.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

The Memorial of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists have become aware of the desire of the Legislature to be informed of public feeling, in all classes concerned, in regard to a proposed change in the criminal law relating to the subjection of European British subjects to certain Native Magistrates in the Mufassal; and that, as loyal subjects, many of whom personally possess the status of European British subjects under the law, your memorialists submit for consideration the following objections which they hold against the change.

2. That it is a wise maxim of British statesmanship that legislation, and more especially important legislation, should wait upon necessity; and that no pressing necessity has been made out for this change, in the Statement of Objects and Reasons which has been given to the country.

6. That, in the absence of such necessity, the grounds advanced for the change are : that it was thought anomalous that, while Natives of India were admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans outside the Presidency town ;" and that " the Government of India had accordingly decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions."

4. That, as regards the implied popularity of an assumed objection to an alleged anomaly, your memorialists have reason to believe that public feeling is very much divided on the subject, and that the preponderance of opinion weighs against, rather than for, the change, but that, at any rate, if the convictions of all thoughtful persons throughout the country, including responsible officials, missionaries, non-officials and native gentlemen of good family and real social influence in the interior, were carefully sought, it would be found that the right of a European British subject to be tried by his peers is not thought more anomalous, or in any way more offensive, and is probably thought much less so than the predominance of British power in India, and that all consistent objections which tell against the one—the mere fraction of a composite anomaly—tell with equal, if not greater, force against the other—the whole.

5. That, in the opinion of the European and Anglo-Indian community, the concessions to native prejudice made in connection with the administration of justice, such as the exemption of the native gentry and ladies from attendance as witnesses in our Law Courts, represent greater anomalies than any involved in the right of European British subjects to be tried by their peers. To such concessions the European community have never demurred ; and they feel that, on this very account, the only right which they themselves have hitherto enjoyed should remain untouched.

6. That, without presuming to assert that the Indian Legislature has no strict legal power to enact that European British subjects may be tried by native judicial officers, your memorialists respectfully submit that a great constitutional difficulty underlies the proposed legislation. That during the many centuries through which the English people struggled for liberty and for the complete and practical attainment of the right of trial by one's peers, the possibility of the spectacle of an Englishman being tried by anybody but an Englishman was not, and could not have been, contemplated. That such a possibility has now arisen not only in India, but in several of the dependencies and colonies belonging to the British Empire, such as Cape Colony, Natal, New Zealand, and the West Indies. That, without denying the many virtues and merits of the Natives of India and of these other countries, it cannot be contended that they are the peers or equals of Englishmen. That the trial of an Englishman by a Native of any of these dependencies, that is to say, the trial of an Englishman by one who is not his peer, is an infringement of a great constitutional right. That your memorialists respectfully, but confidently, submit that the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland is the only Legislature which ought to deal with so momentous a trespass on the principle which is the foundation of English constitutional law.

7. That your memorialists crave leave to submit the following considerations to illustrate the force of the contention put forward in the last preceding paragraph, and to establish the fallacy of what is now popularly known as the argument from anomalies. A peer of the realm, charged with a felony in England, can only be tried by his peers, that is, by the House of Lords. If the principle which underlies the Bill which is now under consideration be sound, an English peer, charged with a similar offence in India, would be liable to be tried and punished by a Bengali Judge. Ex hypothesi, therefore, a Court presided over by a Bengali Judge in India would have a higher jurisdiction than a Court presided over by the Lord Chief Justice of England.

8. That if it is not certain that an English peer, charged with a felony in India, could not claim his constitutional right of being tried by the House of Lords, by parity of reasoning, an English commoner sojourning in India ought also, your memorialists submit, to be considered to have brought with him to India his constitutional right of being tried by his peers ; that, speaking broadly and generally, a Native of India is not an Englishman's peer, and that, therefore, an Englishman in India cannot be liable to be tried by a Native of India.

9. That if one reason now relied upon for the proposed change is, that the administrative difficulty which has arisen in consequence of the appointment of Covenanted Native Civilians to the office of Sessions Judge was not anticipated on former occasions when the question was fully discussed, this reason, your memorialists submit, is not borne out by the provisions of either Act X of 1872 or Act X of 1882, which distinctly contemplated and expressly provided for the contingency of a Sessions Court presided over by a Judge who was not a European British subject. Your memorialists solicit attention to the terms of the two sections :

Section 77, Act X of 1872.—" If the Sessions Judge of the Sessions division within which the offence is ordinarily triable is not a European British subject, the case shall be reported by the Committing Magistrate for the orders of the High Court."

Section 450, Act X of 1882.—" If the Judge of the Sessions division within which the offence is ordinarily triable is not a European British subject, the case shall be reported by the Committing Magistrate for the orders of the highest Court of criminal appeal for the province within which such division is situate."

10. That as regards the allusion made in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, already quoted, to "race distinctions" in law, such an allusion derives all its significance from considerations of abstract justice which cannot, your memorialists respectfully plead, apply to a country sustaining the relation which India unavoidably bears to England; but that if it were applicable at all in this peculiar relation, the same abstract justice on which it relies would demand its enforcement, not against a single distinction, but against every distinction based on difference of race, and that the further action, which would be the only just outcome from any movement in this direction at all, would involve the simultaneous withdrawal of all the privileges and exemptions hitherto conceded to native gentlemen of rank and to native ladies, as well as to the removal of the legal civil disabilities under which European British subjects in a large class of suits between themselves on the one part as plaintiffs, and Muhammadans or Hindus on the other as defendants, are compelled to bear the burden of subjection to Muhammadan and Hindu laws.

11. That as regards the question of personal disqualification unhappily raised in the present discussion on jurisdiction, your memorialists would respectfully remind the Government of India that, as Sir J. FitzJames Stephen, an English jurist of great eminence, and an Anglo-Indian official of some experience, clearly pointed out on the occasion of a former discussion in 1872, "the privilege as to jurisdiction is the privilege of the prisoner and not the privilege of the Judge"; that it would alter the whole attitude consistently for many centuries taken by English law towards persons accused of offences, if allowances deliberately made, and carefully guarded from a tender regard for individuals placed in the painful position of persons accused of offences, and always held to be innocent unless and until proved to be guilty, were now suddenly withdrawn in deference to sentimental ideas about the personal dignity of Judges which find no place among English traditions.

12. That the right of trial by peers forms part and parcel of, and is inseparable from, the habitual concern disclosed by the English law for the accused, and that this concern commends itself to the Christian conscience as the root of many considerate arrangements, which conduce not only to the safety of the body, but also to the comfort of the mind, of a person who may be innocent whilst charged with a foul crime. That all such considerations possess a grave meaning in India, where an innocent accused person may be an Englishwoman, and where women are not treated by men with the chivalrous respect that has grown into a habit in Christian countries.

13. That, under these circumstances, attacks made by Natives in a hostile spirit on privileges conceded to accused persons, betoken, especially when connected in an illogical way with irrelevant questions of personal disqualification, a condition of mind that calls for repression rather than encouragement; and that such attacks, whatever position a few well-meaning Englishmen may thoughtlessly take up in regard to them, could never, your memorialists respectfully urge, be originated by a typical English Magistrate, or a typical English Judge. That the fascination which such attacks evidently possess for a class of over-sensitive Indian minds affords strong proof of the great difference between the English ideal of the judicial mind and the ideal which, in spite of education and external social influence, still prevails in this country; and that such attacks possess a serious significance for the Indian Government which has been understood to repose trust in the judicial qualifications of the educated native mind.

14. That if the proposition submitted by your memorialists be unassailable, namely, that the question of jurisdiction relates to the privileges of the accused, and not to the competence of the Court, a proposition abundantly proved by the numberless exemptions and distinctions based on race and social customs which it is apparently intended inconsistently to leave untouched after the solitary personal right claimed by European British subjects is given up, it should lead, your memorialists respectfully but earnestly urge, to a more careful consideration of the proposed amendment than it would appear yet to have received (judging from the papers published in connection with the Bill introduced into the Legislative Council) from the particular stand-point suggested in the present remarks.

15. That if, and when, so viewed, the right of European British subjects to be tried by their peers commends itself to unprejudiced minds as being not merely absolutely free from all such invidiousness as has unreasonably been imported into it, but also in perfect harmony with the right given to all accused persons in this country to challenge jurors of whose qualifications to understand them and do them justice they themselves (and not the Government or the trying officer) may entertain any doubt. No right-minded European British subject has ever felt offended at being so challenged by an unfortunate Native of India placed on his trial on a criminal charge, or thought of urging on the legislature a withdrawal of the right as involving a reflection on himself or a civil disqualification. Nor, if any wrong-minded European British subject thought fit to do so on the ground of some imaginary offence lurking in the right, or of any inconvenience which it caused to the administration of justice, is it conceivable that the legislature would grant the request.

16. That your memorialists sincerely and solemnly believe, and, therefore, humbly but gravely urge, that a truer lesson in self-culture, and therefore, one better calculated to serve their own higher interests in the end, would be taught to the small section of educated Natives, chiefly in the province of Bengal, who have no real personal interest whatsoever in this matter, but yet have demanded, or are demanding, not only the subjection of European British subjects in the Mufussal to Native Justices of the Peace, but also the prosecution of the principle under-tying the proposed change to its logical extreme, if they were now kindly, but firmly, instructed in the real merits of the question which they have virtually raised, and are keeping open, as these appear to fellow-subjects who have done them no wrong and wish them no harm, than if their present more or less unworthy and wholly unfriendly feeling, and the politically dangerous and socially suicidal mood, of which it is the clear and melancholy evidence, were without sufficient consideration, gratified at much cost to their European British subjects and with no benefit whatever to themselves.

17. That, acting solely in self-defence, and without an unkindly thought or feeling towards those side by side with whom, in the providence of God, they are called to pass their lives in this country, your memorialists earnestly and solemnly pray that the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, now before the Council, may not be passed.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

On behalf of the Board of Direction, Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association.

Telegram from Chairman, Chamber of Commerce, Bombay, to Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department,—dated 5th March, 1883.

At a numerously attended special general meeting of the Chamber, called to consider Bill amending Criminal Procedure Code, following resolutions were passed almost unanimously, three native members only dissenting. That, in the opinion of this meeting, the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code is, under existing circumstances, uncalled for, and ought not to have been introduced without first eliciting the opinions of the un-official classes, whom the proposed change in the administration of the law will affect. Special committee appointed to frame memorial to Viceroy praying abandonment of proposed amendment. Memorial will be forwarded shortly through Bombay Government, but Viceroy proposes stating his views on subject in Legislative Council on 9th instant. Detailed proceedings of meeting and memorial will not reach in time. Chamber respectfully commends resolutions to favourable consideration of Viceroy, submitting no real necessity exists for measure, nor has any pressure been brought upon Government to introduce it. Measure also considered premature, as Bill will affect whole Mufassal European community, while on other hand affecting status of only a few Natives in Bengal and Bombay. Further, measure pronounced inopportune, and calculated to imperil success of other important measures now pending.

RESOLVED—That all present at this meeting protest against any interference with the rights we enjoy as European British subjects in India. That we believe it is only ignorance of the position in which thousands of Europeans are placed in the interior that permitted the proposal to give Natives jurisdiction over European British subjects to be placed before the Council, and that we authorize the Secretary of the Bihar Indigo Planters' Association to request the Hon'ble Sir Stuart Bayley to place this our firm and indignant protest before His Excellency the Viceroy in the assurance that Lord Ripon will not permit our most cherished right of being tried by our peers to be taken from us:—

Resolution of a Public Meeting held at Jitwarpur on 5th March, 1883, received through Honourable Sir S. C. Bayley.

MR. W. S. CROWDY having been voted to the chair.

Proposed by Mr. F. Mackinnon,

Seconded by Mr. W. S. Mackenzie,—

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, the change in the law proposed by Government in the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, by which European British subjects in this country will lose the privilege which they have hitherto enjoyed of being tried by their countrymen, is an unjustified invasion of their rights, which they have done nothing to forfeit.

"The proposed amendment is not required by any administrative necessity; nor in the interests of justice; it will not in any way benefit Natives, while it will seriously endanger the liberties of Europeans in remote parts of the Mufassal.

"The principle of the proposed measure, if once admitted as a basis for legislation, must logically be carried out to still greater lengths in the way of interference with the rights of the European community in India, and calls for the unqualified condemnation and opposition of all those interested in preserving them"—(Carried unanimously.)

Proposed by Mr. S. Nicholson,
Seconded by Mr. W. Mackenzie,—

"That the Secretary of the Bihar Indigo Planters' Association be requested to represent the resolution of this meeting, in combination with the resolutions of other meetings throughout these districts, in the proper quarters, and to co-operate generally with the committee appointed at the Calcutta meeting of 28th February last in petitioning the Indian and Home Governments".—(Carried unanimously.)

No. 330, dated 16th March, 1883.

From—W. C. MACPHERSON, Esq., Assistant Secretary to Chief Commissioner, Assam,
To—The Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department.

At the instance of Mr. James Peters, of Hailakandi, in the Kachar District, I am directed to forward, in original, the minutes of proceedings of a meeting of tea-planters of Hailakandi in which they protest against the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Resolutions passed at a Meeting held at Hailakandi on the 1st March, 1883.

1stly.—Proposed that Mr. Peters take the chair. Carried unanimously.

2ndly.—That the following resolutions be communicated to the Assistant Commissioner:—

3rdly.—That notwithstanding Governmental promises to the effect that no Bill would become law without allowing full time for discussion, this Meeting deprecates the haste with which this Bill is being pushed on, as not allowing the European residents time to lay fully their views before Government, and strongly protests against the same.

4thly.—It was unanimously agreed that the present Meeting view with great apprehension Mr. Ilbert's Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, and beg to record a strong protest against the same, as likely, more especially in Mofussil districts like the tea-districts, to create a still further gap in the already existing race-prejudices, and as being likely to alienate capital from a district which has sprung into a prosperous condition by the aid of European energy and capital.

5thly.—That already, before this has become law, the Native Press are calling for more concessions and protesting against the control of coolies in Darjeeling; such a control, too, as contemplated being only what exists in every town in the United Kingdom. The Meeting, therefore, strongly protests against any of the contemplated concessions.

6thly.—That, under the above circumstances, as there is no time given to lay our views before Government in writing, it is resolved unanimously that the Assistant Commissioner be asked to telegraph the above resolutions to the Chief Commissioner, to be laid immediately before the Viceroy's Council.

With a vote of thanks to the Chair the Meeting dissolved.

No. 459 T., dated 23rd March, 1883.

From—B. G. GRIDT, Esq., Personal Assistant to Chief Commissioner, Assam,
To—The Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department.

I am directed to forward, for submission to his Excellency the Viceroy, a copy of resolution passed by a Meeting of Planters held at Jorehat on the 16th March last, regarding the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Resolutions passed at a Meeting of European Planters held at Cinnawara, in the Jorehat District, on 16th March, 1883.

First.—That this Meeting views with indignant astonishment the proposed alteration of the Criminal Procedure Code giving Natives the power of trying Europeans, and thereby depriving the latter not merely of a privilege but of an inalienable right, that, namely, of every Englishman being tried by his peers, which it is difficult to believe that any Government, however despotic and arbitrary, could wish to deprive him of.

As the present state of the law, under which European British subjects can only be tried by Europeans, does not in any way interfere with the privileges of the Native population, nor involve any injustice towards them, the non-official Europeans of the community here unanimously resolve and pledge themselves to oppose and resist by every means in their power the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, if the amendment becomes law, are strongly convinced that the relations between European and Natives, which hitherto have been most friendly, will be severely strained—a most unfortunate result, for which the Government will be entirely responsible through this ill-advised scheme. Already bitter feelings have been shown on both sides in consequence of it, and the growth of cordiality between the two races, which was the outcome of the policy of former Governments, has been thrown back to a lamentable degree.

Second.—That this Meeting condemns the policy of Government in attempting to degrade the status of the non-official European population without in any way consulting them, and deeply regrets that Government, while professing to do everything in its power to encourage private enterprise, should take such a step, which would undoubtedly be the means of driving away capital from the country generally, but more especially from an outlying province like Assam.

Third.—That copies of the above Resolutions be sent to the Chief Commissioner of Assam and to the Chamber of Commerce, to be forwarded to the Viceroy.

Dated 4th April, 1883.

From—BABOO SAJANI KANT CHATTERJEE, Secretary, Burdwan Association,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I have the honour to forward herewith copy of certain resolutions adopted at a meeting of the inhabitants of District Burdwan held on the 18th ultimo to consider the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, and to request the favour of your laying it before His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

Resolutions adopted at a Meeting of Inhabitants of District Burdwan held on 18th March, 1883.

I. That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, recently introduced into the Legislative Council of India, by conferring criminal jurisdiction on Native members, possessing certain qualifications, of the Covenanted Civil Service of India, over European British subjects residing therein, is a just, wise and righteous measure.

II. That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, recently introduced into the Legislative Council of India, by conferring criminal jurisdiction on Native members, possessing certain qualifications, of the Covenanted Civil Service of India, over European British subjects residing therein, is calculated to remove a growing administrative inconvenience and to put an end to an unnecessary disqualification affecting the people of this country.

III. That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the judicial officers on whom the above jurisdiction is proposed to be conferred are not unfit, either by their education or their nationality to exercise the same.

IV. That the thanks of this Meeting be conveyed to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India for this fresh instance of his noble policy to promote in every respect the welfare and prosperity of this vast country the government of which is now committed to his care.

V. That the Burdwan Association be requested to forward the above resolutions on behalf of this Meeting to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India.

No. 2351, dated 5th April 1883.

From—C. G. W. MACPHERSON, Esq., Under-Secretary to Government of Bombay.

To—The Secretary to Government of India, Legislative Department.

At the request of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, I am directed to forward to the address of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India the accompanying memorial, dated the 22nd ultimo, praying that the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, now before the Legislative Council of the Government of India, may be abandoned.

Dated 22nd March 1883.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable THE MARQUIS OF RIPON, P.C., K.G., G.C.B., G.M.S.I., Viceroy and Governor General of India.

Memorial of Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That at a numerously attended General Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce held on the 6th March 1883, to discuss the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, Amendment Bill, now before the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Governor General, the following Resolutions were passed almost unanimously, three Native members of the Chamber only dissenting :—

- 1.—That in the opinion of this Meeting, the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code is, under existing circumstances, uncalled for, and ought not to have been introduced without first eliciting the opinions of the non-official classes whom the proposed change in the administration of the law will affect.
- 2.—That the following members of the Chamber, namely, the Chairman of the Chamber, Mr. M. Mowat, the Hon'ble W. M. Macaulay, Messrs. Bythell, Russell, L. R. W. Forrest and Blascheck, be appointed a Sub-Committee, with power to add to their number, to prepare a memorial to the Viceroy, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to abandon the proposed alteration in the law.

That the discussion which resulted in the passing of these resolutions is contained in the printed proceedings of the Meeting which are appended hereto, and to which your Excellency's attention is respectfully invited.

That the privilege which Englishmen have hitherto enjoyed, of being tried by their own countrymen, is one on which they set the highest value. It has never interfered in any way with the rights of the Natives, nor has it occasioned inconvenience to any appreciable extent in the administration of justice.

That the European communities acquiesced in the proposal to confer on Native Magistrates jurisdiction over Europeans in the Presidency-towns, in the well-grounded belief that in those towns there were sufficient safeguards for the efficient performance of the duties of their office. The example of other Judges, the vigilant criticism of an able and influential Bar, from whom the Magistrates at the same time receive valuable assistance in arriving at their decisions, and the influence of an intelligent public opinion, were generally felt to be sufficient guarantees against miscarriage of justice. But the case is widely different in the districts of the Mufassal, where a few isolated Europeans may have to contend with the prejudices of the surrounding people, who are necessarily ignorant of their customs and feelings. Even in England, in places where feeling runs high against the accused, it is not uncommon to change the venue in order to secure for him a fair and impartial trial. It is not unnatural for the Native Judge in the Mufassal, however able he may be, and anxious to dispense justice impartially, to be to some extent influenced, it may be unwittingly, by the prejudices of his own people: he enjoys none of the advantages which the Native Magistrates in the Presidency-towns possess, while the European who may be brought before him can neither have the assistance of his countrymen to defend him, nor the protecting influence of a strong and enlightened public opinion. Examples, indeed, are not wanting of the difference between the administration of justice in a place in the interior where an European British subject cannot have counsel to represent him, and where there is no public opinion, and the dispensing of justice in Bombay, where there is a strong Press and he can employ counsel to defend him.

That the Code of Criminal Procedure was exhaustively discussed in 1872, and, after having been in force for ten years, was last year re-enacted, and came into force on 1st January 1883. A variety of alterations and amendments were introduced into the new code, after it had been submitted to the different local Governments for their opinions, but no alteration was made in that part of it which related to European British subjects. This, your memorialists respectfully submit, in itself showed that no practical reason, no real urgency, existed to justify the withdrawal of what is perhaps the only legal privilege which European subjects in India possess against many, on the same principle, which Natives of rank and influence enjoy.

That in the discussion in the Legislative Council on the 9th of March, your Excellency was pleased to admit that at present there is no irresistible necessity for introducing this measure, although it might be an inconvenience to the administration of justice and a hardship to suitors if the present state of things were allowed to exist. And the Honourable Mr. Gibbs cited as an example Carwar (where Mr. Tagore was Sessions Judge), in the neighbourhood of which large railway-works were being commenced. These works would, he said, bring European British subjects in considerable numbers into that district; and if they were not tried by the Sessions Judge, they would either have to be sent by sea to Bombay, or have to march 80 or 100 miles through a district which at many times of the year was injurious to health. The illustration was an unhappy one, inasmuch as the railway referred to is being carried inland from Marmagao through Portuguese territory, and not from Carwar. Supposing, however, a large number of Europeans had been attracted to the Carwar collectorate by the construction of a railway, your memorialists submit that it would have been preferable to have appointed an European Magistrate to the district, instead of altering the law of the land to meet an isolated and exceptional case such as the one in question.

That in a country such as India, whose population is composed of so many different races, languages and religions, it is in the highest degree impolitic to introduce fundamental changes in the law, affecting large and important sections, unless such changes are justified by urgent necessity; and your memorialists are of opinion that any such change now is premature and uncalled for.

That it has always been regarded as of great importance to the Government that harmony should exist between the Government and the general European population; and it is much to be regretted that Government did not take the precaution to elicit an expression of their opinion before the proposed Bill was introduced into the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Governor General.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully pray that your Excellency may be pleased to abandon the proposed alteration in the law.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, Amendment Bill.

The CHAIRMAN in opening the proceedings said:—"Gentlemen, you are all, I dare say, very well aware that at a meeting of the Viceregal Council held in Calcutta early last month, the Honourable Mr. Ilbert, the Legal Member of the Government of India, asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, which was only passed in the beginning of last year—in fact, it is only just a year old to-day, having been passed on the 6th March 1882. The object of our meeting to-day is to consider the propriety of that measure becoming law or being carried any further. We have come here to pronounce our opinion upon it, and to express our views as to whether the amendment should take effect or not. As all of you, who have been reading the daily Press, are aware, the question has been very warmly discussed, more particularly in Bengal, and it has also attracted very general attention in England. It is quite right, and quite proper, that we, as the representatives of the European mercantile community and also of the non-official community of this city, should meet to discuss this question and express our opinion upon it; but I trust that nothing that will be said in this room to-day will have the effect or be likely to stir up ill-feeling either between ourselves and the Government of this country or between ourselves and our native fellow-subjects. I think that a temperate expression of opinion will be not only more dignified, but it will probably carry more weight, and by adhering to that principle we shall avoid giving offence to, or wounding the feelings or susceptibilities of, those with whom I think it is our duty as fellow-subjects of the same sovereign to be on a good and friendly footing. We were obliged, gentlemen, to call our meeting at a very late hour for various reasons, and I don't intend for that reason, and also for the reason that other gentlemen will speak presently to the resolutions which have been circulated amongst you, to go minutely into the subject of this proposed Bill myself; but I shall, at the same time, before sitting down, take the opportunity of saying that I disapprove of the measure, and I shall give some reasons for saying so. The first thing that strikes me is that there is really no pressing necessity for this measure at all; and I don't think that we require to go any further than Mr. Ilbert's speech in asking leave to introduce this measure to show that this is the case. The Criminal Code, as you are aware, was last amended previous to 1882 in 1872, and this very question we are met to discuss came on then; and although I don't wish to go minutely into what took place at that time, I may say that it was carried, by a majority of seven to five, that this amendment should not be given effect to. Mr. Ilbert takes great care to cite the opinions of the five who were in favour of that amendment being introduced into the measure, but he leaves out, or says nothing about, the opinions of the seven. I don't think it is likely that the whole of these seven were non-official members, for I think from our experience we may assume that no measure could be carried by a non-official majority in any legislative council in this country. To proceed, however, Mr. Ilbert starts by saying that from that time (1872) forward, when any suggestions were offered to the Government of India in the direction of the amendment of the Code, the question always came up. Now, one would have thought that, if that had been so, the Government would have taken the very earliest opportunity of ascertaining the opinions not only of their own officers but of the public generally, and would have acted as speedily as possible on the opinions they might receive. You have only to read a little further on, and it becomes quite apparent that for ten years they did nothing. This Code, as I have previously explained, became law a year ago to-day. The Government had completed all the amendments they intended to give effect to, and this question never came up at all, and, as Mr. Ilbert says himself, the now historical Mr. Gupta's letter or his suggestion that this amendment should be made in the Code came forward at the last moment when it was impossible to introduce it. What the Government afterwards did was to take the opinions of some of their own officers, and now we have the result before us. I think it is clear, as has been shown, that there is no pressing necessity for this measure in the shape of the proposed amendment. In fact, the only person whose name has been associated with it, as far as can be gathered, is Mr. Gupta, and, as Mr. Ilbert says, his letter gave rise to the discussion. That concludes what I have to say on that point, and I think there can be no question that there was no real necessity for introducing the measure, or any pressure brought upon Government to introduce it. Another point that strikes me, gentlemen, is this: it seems to me that the measure is premature. I have shown you from what Mr. Ilbert said that there was no pressing necessity for it, and I also think it unquestionably premature for this reason: this Bill will have the effect of touching the whole of the Mufassal European community, while, on the other hand, it will only affect the status of some six Native Civilians in Bengal, and I think I have seen it stated only one here. Therefore, I say that for that reason it is premature. I also say it is premature for this reason, that the Presidency-towns are in a very much more advanced state than the Mufassal. It is proposed to extend this measure to the whole country—to the most most outlying and backward districts, where you may say that civilization has been barely introduced, and I am of opinion that from that point of view the Bill is premature. If the mufassal was as advanced as our Presidency-towns are, then there might have been some reason for introducing a measure of this kind. I not only consider, however, that the measure is premature, but I also consider it has been introduced at a very inopportune moment. We all know that the Government have got at least three very important measures before them at the present moment, one of which at least introduces very radical and sweeping changes; and many people, including myself, I may say, think that the country is scarcely prepared or ripe for these measures. I cannot help thinking that, that being so, it was particularly inopportune to introduce the measure at the present time, when other important measures about which there has been, and is likely to be, a good deal of difference of opinion, are pending. Then, gentlemen, I also object to the Bill, because it was brought forward without allowing the classes who are likely to be affected by it any opportunity of being heard. It has been, in a sense, sprung upon us, and not only upon us, but, as you may have noticed in the debate to which I have referred, the Honourable Mr. Evans, one of the members of the Council, stated that he heard for the first time on the day of the meeting what the proposed measure was. He was ignorant of the character of the measure, and we also were ignorant of it until it was brought forward in the Council. It strikes me as being very much out of place to introduce a measure of this kind on the strength of the opinions elicited by a private circular, without the non-official community generally having an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon a measure which was to affect them so closely as this measure does. It is all very well for gentlemen who would have the administration of the law to express approval of it, but it looks rather different to those who are certain to be affected by the administration of it; and I cannot help thinking that when this private circular—which none of us have seen, and which I should rather like to see—was sent round, probably, I think very likely, most of the officials to whom it was sent looked upon the question from a theoretical rather than from a practical point of view, without considering what effect the introduction of such a measure would have on the country. I notice further, gentlemen, that Mr. Ilbert says, in speaking of this circular, that its result was very remarkable. Well, I should think that he must have realised ere this that the effect of acting upon the circular has been very remarkable indeed. I think he must feel now, and I think that the Government of India must also feel, that they have made a blunder in bringing forward a measure of this kind without pressure, most inopportune, and without the public likely to be affected by it having had an opportunity of expressing an opinion about it. I will not say more now, other gentlemen having to speak to the resolutions which have been circulated amongst you. I think it is quite likely I may have touched upon some points which other gentlemen may speak upon, and, if such is the case, I hope that they will enlarge upon and enforce, rather than pass over, any point that I may have alluded to. With these remarks, gentlemen, I call upon Mr. Mowat to speak to the first resolution."

MR. NANABHOY BYRAMJEE JEKJEEBHOY: "Mr. Chairman, before Mr. Mowat proposes the resolution, I should like to know whether you have received any letter from any one."

The CHAIRMAN: "We have received a letter from some of the members of this Chamber, and we have sent an answer to it. Have you got the answer?"

MR. NANABHOY: "It was the special desire of the members that it should be read before the meeting."

The CHAIRMAN: "I am asking whether you have got the answer?"

MR. NANABHOY: "That letter was for the information of the members."

The CHAIRMAN: "I don't consider that there was any necessity for its being read."

MR. NANABHOY: "Then you rule that that letter shall not be read. I bow to your decision."

The CHAIRMAN: "I have not given any decision as yet." (Laughter.)

MR. NANABHOY: "You say that the letter shall not be read."

The CHAIRMAN: "The letter to which you refer was received about half-past two. It objected to this Chamber taking up this question, and the answer which was sent to you by my directions was that we considered it quite competent for the Chamber to discuss this question; and if you had any reasons to give against its doing so, you ought to come here and state them."

MR. NANABHOY: "We are going to speak, and we have come here to speak."

The CHAIRMAN: "Very well."

MR. NANABHOY: "Then you rule that that letter shall not be read."

The CHAIRMAN: "There is no necessity that it should be read, seeing that you are here to speak and vote for yourself like any other member of the Chamber."

MR. MOWAT said—"In proposing the first resolution, which runs thus—'That in the opinion of this meeting, the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code is, under existing circumstances, uncalled for and ought not to have been introduced without first eliciting the opinions of the non-official classes whom the proposed change in the administration of the law will affect,'—I would draw your attention to the temperate manner in which it is worded; and in the remarks which I am about to make I mean to be considerate towards the various races interested in the Bill lately brought forward by the Government of India. Throughout the length and breadth of this vast empire it has been the leading subject of discussion for nearly a fortnight, and it has been taken up with more than ordinary warmth in Bengal; and the voice of England has not been silent. I most earnestly trust the tension which now exists will find a solution long before November comes round. Although we have been later in approaching the subject than our friends in Calcutta and Madras, we are not behind them in the interest we take in any matter affecting the criminal law by which our British-born fellow-countrymen are tried abroad. In order to grasp the leading facts, let me point out what was done in 1872. This subject was then thoroughly discussed, and the debates which took place in the Supreme Legislative Council possess more than ordinary interest. Although five eminent names, including an ex-Governor of Madras and the late Governor of Bombay, appear on one side, seven gentlemen who have also left their impress on India took the opposite view, and one of those was the distinguished lawyer, Sir James Stephen, who had charge of the then Criminal Procedure Bill. By this Act, which was the result of a compromise, Native Magistrates in the Presidency-towns were allowed jurisdiction over Europeans, but their power extended no further, and the reasons for so doing appear to me to be very strong. Gentlemen, with public opinion and a powerful Press such as we find in the great cities, we can understand why a difference was made between them and the Mufassal. But, even in the great Presidency-towns, cases arise which are surrounded with more than ordinary difficulty, and which tax the keenest intellects of the Bench and the Bar. At a great social banquet which took place in Bombay a little over three years ago, and at which I had the honour to preside, a Judge of the High Court, whose manly straight-forwardness and upright character have gained for him a wide circle of friends among all classes, expressed himself thus:—'The administration of justice in India, and no less in Bombay, is carried on with extreme difficulty, owing to the vast preponderance of unworthy testimony by the Native witnesses we have before us. A Judge in this country can only act on the facts in the case before him, and it would be impossible for us to form our judgments satisfactorily were it not for the admirable manner in which the cases are prepared by able and experienced solicitors and clerks, and for the arguments and the ability which are bestowed upon those facts by accomplished barristers.' (Cheers). If this is the case in one of the leading cities in the Empire, what safeguards must we insist on for the poor European in the districts? There are not able and experienced solicitors there; further, there are no accomplished barristers. But, gentlemen, I can tell you what will not be wanting. As a juryman I have had to listen to suborned witnesses; they and the other surroundings will find a place. An oath or affirmation to the uneducated Native classes is of little or no value; and are we to expose our countrymen to criminal charges made on such evidence? Far be it from me to speak otherwise than respectfully of Native Magistrates whom this country chooses to honour with the dignity. As educated men we expect a great deal from them. But I hold that, in a criminal charge against a European, things may arise on which an Englishman or British-born subject only can form a correct judgment. If, therefore, the Magistrate, witnesses and other surroundings are entirely Native, can we suppose that there will never be a miscarriage of justice? From the public Press, which has lately been flooded with literature on this subject, we find that the Native community are far from agreed, for in common fairness we may put Mr. Khory's letter of this morning against that of the Honourable Mr. Tyabjee. A leading Magistrate who had a great many years' experience in the Mufassal, when speaking to me quite recently, was not slow to point out the dangers which would beset the proposed alteration in the law. Perhaps a time will come when a revision of the existing Code may be considered with advantage; but it is clearly not now. The lower classes amongst the Native community must first be advanced. The non-official classes very justly complain that they have not been consulted in this matter, especially seeing that they will be affected by Mr. Ilbert's proposed change. The legal and official classes, however, were consulted, and we learn that they have not been unanimous. English capital is now pouring into the country for reproductive works, necessitating a large number of European employés. They consist of railway-servants, press and mill managers, cotton-agents and the like. In this Presidency, they are fewer in number than in the other two, but they are not the less deserving of our care and attention. (Applause.) Their probable future is a question for the sociologist, and I cannot say that I look upon it with anything like satisfaction. With the progress of works in the Mufassal their numbers will increase, but from the Natives who are making such rapid strides in education, they will have to suffer the keenest competition—a competition not likely to diminish. A large portion of those now labouring in the districts will never again behold the Island which gave them birth, while their families will have to make the best of life under all the disadvantages of a tropical sun. These are the classes most likely to be seriously affected by the new Bill; and, as they can least protect themselves, it is our duty to see that their rights and privileges are kept inviolate. They supply that cheap European labour which at the present time is indispensable in the formation of public works. As a rule, many of them are poor, and the fee necessary to secure the services of an English barrister or a first class vakil for defence in a criminal charge is more than they are able to command. Let us therefore be careful and not deprive our poorer countrymen of privileges which they have hitherto enjoyed, and to which they attach the highest value. According to the best authorities, they now do this without in any way interfering with the rights of the Natives of the country. Sir James Stephen's remarks are valuable. He says:—"In countries situated as most European countries are, it is no doubt desirable that there should be no personal laws; but in India it is otherwise. Personal, as opposed to territorial, laws, prevail here on all sorts of subjects, and their maintenance is claimed with the utmost pertinacity by those who are subject to them. The Muhammadan has his personal law; the Hindu has his personal law. Women who, according to the custom of the country, ought not to appear in court, are excused from appearing in court. Natives of rank and influence enjoy, in many cases, privileges which stand on precisely the same principle; and are English people to be told that, whilst it is their duty to respect all these laws scrupulously, they are to claim nothing for themselves? That whilst English Courts are to respect, and even to enforce, a variety of laws which are thoroughly repugnant to all the strongest convictions of Englishmen, Englishmen who settle in this country are to surrender privileges to which, rightly or otherwise, they attach the highest possible importance? I can see no ground or reason for such a contention." (Applause.) We have now to consider in a careful spirit what ought to be done? It is not too late for Government to withdraw the Bill, and this might be gracefully done in the interests of all concerned. No one wishes to see a race feeling exist, and our native fellow-subjects are no doubt as anxious on this point as we are. The Government is full of other schemes for their advancement, and it is a good old maxim not to have 'too many irons in the fire.' A thing may be done with dignity and prudence to-day, which the force of events, if not checked, may materially alter in a week's time. In conclusion, I appeal to the Imperial Government to withdraw a measure which under existing circumstances is unnecessary; I appeal to those in power to stem the current of class feeling which appears to have arisen on the other side of India, and which, if continued, may be fatal to the best interests of the country." (Loud applause.)

The Hon. W. M. MACAULAY: "Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—When I consented to second the resolution which Mr. Mowat has just read, I did so in the firm conviction that it is not desirable for us to follow the footsteps of our brethren in Calcutta in the manner of our opposition to the Bill. I think it is very much to be regretted that some of the speakers there permitted themselves so far to forget what they were saying and their duty to their fellow-subjects as to use language, which one, at least, has since apologised for. Such language cannot assist in achieving the object we have in view but would rather damage it. In speaking to the resolution I shall, with your permission, first refer to the second portion of it; and I confess to a feeling of very deep regret that the Government of India have introduced a measure of such vital importance to a large and most important section of the community without consulting one individual of the community affected by the measure. It is true, as Mr. Ilbert informed the Council, that the various Local Governments were consulted, and that none of them objected to it. We are also told that the opinions expressed by the officials who had been consulted showed an overwhelming consensus of opinion in favour of the proposed change. But it was only a short time ago that a Bill which was passed through the local Legislative Council of Bombay, and supported by what was termed an overwhelming consensus of official opinion, was vetoed by the same Government that now attaches so much importance to the same official opinion. I think, therefore, this leaves a door open to them by which they can gracefully retire. They can with very good ground assign as their reason for retiring from the position they have assumed, that they have acted on incorrect information. We have been told that the Judges of the High Court of Bombay have, with one exception, expressed themselves in favour of the measure. This may be so: but I think it not improbable—in fact, I have some grounds for saying so—that the opinion which was so given was more an opinion from a theoretical point of view, as the Chairman has observed, than from a practical point. If the Judges of the High Court here, whom we all respect, as was justly observed, had been asked to express their opinion as to the practical application of these changes to the whole of the Mufassal districts of India, to the outlying provinces of Assam, the Punjab and other partially civilised localities, I do not hesitate to say that there would have been amongst these Judges more than one dissident. (Hear, hear.) It is a source of great regret to every right-thinking person that the Government of India did not take the public into their confidence at they had promised to do. It was perfectly easy for them to have ascertained to a nicety what the English public would think of the measure by consulting public bodies like this Chamber. There are also Planters' Associations, Trades Associations and such other bodies in various parts of India, who, on a reference being made to them, could have told that the measure would raise a storm such as we are now experiencing. Happily for us, the circumstances of Bombay, and even the Mufassal of Bombay, render the measure less objectionable, if confined to Bombay, than it would be if applied to the whole of India. In this city, of which I have had a very lengthened experience, I know that the feeling of amity that exists between the two races of Europeans and Natives is very different from what exists on the other side of India. Here there is more mutual confidence and friendship than elsewhere. I have heard many intelligent Native gentlemen, several of whom rank amongst my friends, express their opinion that, for their part, they would prefer to have their affairs dealt with by European Judges rather than by their own countrymen. We cannot on such a subject as this expect to have unanimity; but I think that there is a very strong section of the Native community who think that the Bill is not at all called for. In our daily mercantile experience we come in contact with numerous Natives; and in hundreds of cases they enter into contracts with Europeans, readily agreeing to refer their disputes to the arbitration of Europeans. This, I think, speaks volumes for the confidence they repose in the integrity of Europeans. That the measure is uncalled for at present there cannot be the slightest doubt. Until the introduction of the measure the other day before the Supreme Council, so far as I know, the question had slumbered since the discussion which took place in the Council in 1872. Our Native fellow-subjects have lately been more than satisfied and gratified by the radical changes which have been introduced, or which, to speak more correctly, are about to be introduced; and these changes will give them a good deal of power in the management of their own affairs. It is a great pity, as the Chairman has pointed out, that for the benefit of a few Native Magistrates the right of the many should be sacrificed. However, I think the number of Magistrates who will be affected by the Bill is not so very small as the Chairman believes. I think in this Presidency alone, some half-a-dozen magistrates would be affected by it. But, even if the number were ten times half-a-dozen, it is no justification for introducing a measure which is calculated to stir up strife and re-open wounds which we hoped had healed. When the local self-government scheme was not yet put into force, it is most inopportune that the Government should have introduced further legislation, especially of such a character as this. I am afraid that, if the Bill be proceeded with, it will prejudice to a great extent the proper development of this scheme in the future. Great progress has been made within the last twenty years. Had it not been so, the modified change which permitted magistrates of Native birth to have jurisdiction over Europeans in the Presidency-towns, would not have been brought about. But I repeat that it is premature at this early stage to introduce such a radical change from laws which have always been in force since the country has been occupied by our countrymen." (Applause.)

MR. N. BYRAMJEE JEEJEEBHAY said: "Gentlemen,—I rise to propose an amendment to the proposition which is before the meeting. I am strongly of opinion that this Chamber will be exceeding its functions by committing itself to a proposition of this nature. Ever since the Chamber was first established, on 22nd September 1836, mainly owing to the exertions of Mr. Harry George Gordon, of Messrs. Ritchie, Stewart & Co., it has never ceased to interest itself in the commercial welfare of the city and port of Bombay, and has on numerous occasions rendered most valuable assistance and collected important information, not only to the advantage of the local commercial community, but to the Government of India, who has frequently consulted the Chamber on special important subjects. The Chamber has hitherto steered clear of all race-distinctions, and has shown itself most creditably above all race-prejudices. This characteristic of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce has been acknowledged and emphasized by the admission of Natives. The Chamber has always been considered an influential and representative body, but since the accession of Native members, its representative power and character has increased considerably; and, instead of representing only one class of the vast mercantile community of this city, it now lays claim, and very justly too, to be the advocate and mouthpiece of the whole commercial community of this Presidency, and is no longer the European Chamber of Commerce, but truly and literally the Bombay Chamber of Commerce. What does the Chamber represent as a body? It represents Bombay commerce, and should be very careful not to curtail its representative character by lending its influence to politico-sectarian sentimentality and race-questions. The Bengal Chamber and the Madras Chamber may be excused for their action in the matter of the Jurisdiction Bill, composed as they are entirely of European merchants. It is not very long, gentlemen, since this Chamber extended its scope of usefulness and influence, but during the short time that has elapsed since the joining of the Native members, things have gone on very smoothly and harmoniously, and it would be a thousand pities were that harmony and unanimity to be unnecessarily disturbed. I do not wish to enter now into the controversy about this Bill which the Government of India, all the local Governments, Her Majesty's Secretary of State, and all the more distinguished officers of Government throughout India, considered necessary for the due administration of justice in this country; and all I wish to say is that such a proposition as that moved by Mr. Mowat should not, and could not, come appropriately from a mixed Chamber of Europeans and Natives. If the European merchants of Bombay are desirous of giving expression to their views about the Bill, by all means let them do so at a public meeting of the European citizens. I am aware that I shall be in a very small minority, and the proposition will most probably be passed in spite of my humble opinion; yet, gentlemen, I conscientiously believe it to be my duty to make that opinion known, and my feeble voice raised against what I respectfully submit and maintain is an unnecessary and untimely proceeding likely to disturb the harmony of the Chamber and to mar the good will which now happily characterises its proceedings. If this much-to-be-regretted action on the part of this Chamber will, as I apprehend it is sure to do, give rise to a strong counter-movement on the part of the Native community of Bombay, the Chamber will be responsible for creating any bad blood and angry feeling which may unhappily arise; and I am sure no one will be more sorry than I shall be if the commendable good feeling and harmony which exists in this Presidency amongst the different sections of our mixed community are needlessly disturbed or destroyed. Gentlemen, my first connection with the Chamber dates so far back as 1865, and from that time up to now I have never known a single instance in which the Chamber lent its influence or countenance to any question of race or class distinctions or differences, and it ought not to do so now. (Applause.) With these remarks I beg to propose as an amendment—"That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the action now proposed to be taken with regard to the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill is one foreign to the object and purposes of the Chamber, and that it is highly desirable, for many obvious and weighty reasons, that the Chamber decline to take up any politico-sectarian question."

MR. SORABJEE FRAMJEE PATEL said: "Gentlemen,—I rise with reluctance to second the amendment my friend Mr. Nanabhoy Byramjee Jeejeebhoy has proposed, for I consider it unfortunate for me at this juncture to be compelled to go against the wishes of gentlemen for many of whom I entertain the highest esteem. With not a few of them I have at times been associated in discussing important questions in a most friendly spirit, when serving as a member of the Committees of the Chamber. In fact, gentlemen, my connection, including that of my father, with the Chamber, dates as far back as the last 35 years or more; and I must admit that in this long interval both he and myself have received every kind consideration at its hands, as I am sure my Native friends who have since joined have also experienced. I therefore feel it the more incumbent to appeal to your good sense and judgment to avoid, as far as it may be in your power, taking any step that may tend to disturb the harmony which has for many years so happily prevailed. What I beg of you, gentlemen, is to weigh calmly my request; for I am no less grieved at the disunion which your resolution will create in the Chamber than the ill-feeling and passions it is calculated to arouse throughout the great and varied commercial community of Bombay. The sequel of your step in this matter might unfortunately be either the holding of public meetings by those who are in favour of the Bill, or unpleasant, injudicious and imprudent writings in the Press. In both cases, no one, as you are aware, can answer for the lengths to which party feelings and passions may be carried by those who cannot command themselves. But the effect of all this will be certainly most disastrous to all concerned, and will excite bitter feelings and leave indelible reminiscences which it will take perhaps a full quarter of a century to efface. I have no wish, gentlemen, to enter into a lengthy discussion with such intelligent and liberal-minded members as those who are in favour of the resolution; but I cannot help drawing your attention to the fact that you cannot with propriety take up questions which are purely political, and do not affect the general commercial interests of the community, nor could you take up class-questions, much less grievances, of a particular race. In support of this assertion permit me to quote the very first of our Chamber's rules and regulations. It states that 'the object and duties of the Chamber shall be to encourage a friendly feeling and unanimity among commercial men on all subjects involving their common good, to promote and protect the general mercantile interests of this Presidency.' I ask, with your permission, does the action which the Chamber is asked to take tend to 'promote and protect the general mercantile interests of this Presidency?' Will it 'encourage a friendly feeling among the commercial classes on all subjects involving their common good?' Does it come within the category of 'the removal of all acknowledged grievances affecting merchants (European and Native) as a body, or affecting mercantile interests in general?' Certainly not. I am sure, gentlemen, if you will only dispassionately weigh my reasons and arguments, supported by the fact that they are based on the fundamental rules and regulations framed by this Chamber, you will, I doubt not, adopt the amendment proposed by Mr. Nanabhoy and seconded by myself. In coming to a conclusion on this important question, I beseech you not to let your party feelings be roused by what indiscreet persons may have said and written elsewhere." (Applause.)

MR. J. K. BYTHELL: "Mr. Chairman and Gentleman,—I came here this afternoon determined not to speak, but after the remarks made by my friends Mr. Nanabhoy and Mr. Sorabjee I should like to say a few words. Their argument, as I understand it, is that the Chamber has exceeded its functions, and that its functions ought to be limited to what they term measures affecting our commercial welfare. They are also of opinion that we are proposing to take steps now which are likely to raise class-prejudices and to create race-feeling. It appears to me that the Chamber is not exceeding its functions at all. A great many of us have representatives in the interior; and if we deal with a measure which is introduced into the Legislative Council affecting our welfare and detrimental to our interests, it seems to me that it is quite within our functions to bring the matter before the Chamber of Commerce, which is the only body in Bombay representing our interests. (Applause.) I think the two gentlemen who have just spoken are mistaken when they are inclined to think that the resolutions before the meeting will, if passed, foster class-prejudices. Native gentlemen know that we not only welcome them when they propose to join us, but that we have invited them and asked them to do so. I can say that during the time I was officially connected with the Chamber I did all I could to get my Native friends to join the Chamber. I have always wished to get as large a proportion of Native merchants and Native gentlemen connected with trade in the Chamber as possible, in order that it might be strictly representative of Bombay commerce and not merely representative of a class; and I think that these gentlemen will say, on reflection, that it is quite possible for us to be very strongly averse to having any of our European employés in the interior tried by Native Magistrates where we cannot get a European barrister, and yet have no feeling of antagonism towards our Native friends. Even in the case of Natives, cases have been known in which men have been tried and convicted in the interior with respect to matters which, if tried in Bombay, would have resulted immediately in an acquittal. Take for instance, the old Cotton Frauds Act. You know that in Dharwar and in many other parts of India, where there was no public opinion and no Press, Natives were prosecuted, convicted and fined for mixing cotton from adjoining fields; and, as I have told, gentlemen, Government servants, the same thing was being done here by European merchants, myself included, and that they should come and prosecute us in a place where we could get a barrister to defend ourselves. There is an example and a very forcible example, between the justice in a place where you cannot have counsel to represent you and have no public opinion, and the dispensing of justice in Bombay, where you have a strong Press and can employ counsel to defend you. (Applause.) It is quite possible for us to hold a strong opinion upon this subject and yet not be actuated by class-prejudices. (Hear, hear.) We don't object to Native gentlemen acting as Magistrates in Bombay, where there is a healthy public opinion, and where we can have our fellow-countrymen as counsel; and it appears to me that, if race-questions are raised, it is not the Chamber who is to blame, but the Government of India who stirred this matter up. (Applause.) The old state of things did no harm to anybody. Mr. Macaulay thinks that the Chairman was mistaken in stating that only one gentleman would be affected by having these powers given to him if the Bill is passed; but I have been informed that this is correct, and that there is only one gentleman in the Presidency on whom these larger powers would now be conferred under the amendment if the Bill were passed; and, therefore, why stir up all this class-prejudice and set us all by our ears in the manner that the Bill before the Government of India has done? (Hear, hear.) With reference to the question of giving more extended power to the Natives, I may say that I differ most materially from the Chairman that this proposed extension of municipal power is a mistake. When the Municipal Act under which our Corporation now sits was introduced, we had sixteen days' consecutive debate in Poona about it, and I protested most strongly against the inhabitants, who are allowed to elect one-half of the members of the Corporation, having no power virtually to do anything beyond voting the budget. In the same way, when the Mufassal Municipality Bill, which was passed in 1873, came on for consideration, I protested most strongly against the principle of the Bill, and contended that so long as you had the Collector in the chair a great many official members on the board and all the non-officials elected by the Chairman, it was a farce to call it a municipality at all. I would go in for giving the Natives much more power in these things; but while advocating their claims in that way, I must say I do object very strongly indeed to Europeans connected with our own firms in the interior being brought up before a Native Magistrate where we cannot have the assistance of our own countrymen to defend them. It has been spoken of as an anomaly that these things should exist: I know that this is delicate ground to touch on; but as a newspaper said the other day, 'If you are going to take up that argument, our whole position in India is an anomaly.' So long as we are in India, anomalies must exist, and it appears to me that the best course for the Government of India to take is to leave such matters alone, unless it can clearly be shown that great injustice is being inflicted upon somebody. In the case of this Bill, it is impossible to shew that injustice is being done. You cannot say that it is great injustice that half-a-dozen gentlemen invested with magisterial powers should not be permitted to try Europeans. We contend that this Bill, if passed into law, instead of allaying class-prejudices, will foster them to a great extent, and I hope that the Government of India will be induced to withdraw the Bill. I hope that the Native gentlemen connected with this Chamber will realise and see that it is quite possible for us to oppose this Bill and yet entertain very kindly feelings towards them, and that we are always very glad to see them amongst us." (Applause.)

MR. VIZBHOOKANDAS ATMARAM said: "As a party signing the protest* which has just been read over to the meeting, I feel constrained to say a few words so as to explain fully the reasons which have induced us to adopt this course in reference to the action it is intended to be taken in the name of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce regarding the all-engrossing and really burning question of the day. At the time when we made up our minds to enter this protest, we were fully alive to the fact that our motives in this matter were most likely to be misconstrued and misinterpreted, inasmuch as this question has unfortunately assumed an aspect which is gallingly painful to every true lover of India. It is certainly to be regretted that the tone and spirit of the opposition adopted in this matter in Bengal and Madras has called into existence race-antipathies, which certainly prevents a just, proper and considerate treatment of this question; but, so far as this meeting is concerned, it is unnecessary for us to go into the merits and demerits of this question, because I can assure you, gentlemen, that, in arriving at this decision, we have not at all been influenced by any arguments which have been or can be advanced for or against the Bill now before the Viceregal Council. We feel that this is not the place for discussing political questions involving sectarian interests. The only reason which has induced us to oppose the passing of the resolutions proposed at to-day's meeting is that the action of the Chamber in this matter is not one which it could legitimately, on a plain and rational construction of the objects of its constitution, adopt. The objects and duties of this Chamber, as its very name tacitly implies, and as its rules and regulations expressly declare, are to concern itself in matters purely commercial. The rules further provide that the only occasions on which it can, by its constitution, communicate with public authorities, are when subjects of general mercantile interest render them necessary. I fully admit that the objects and duties of the Chamber are expressed in general words; but I venture to state that it is not possible to include even within these general words the subject of the so-called criminal jurisdiction, except by putting a very strained and far-fetched construction upon the words used in defining such objects and duties. The question really involved in the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill is purely political, appertaining to one section of the community. It is certainly one in which the parties who may feel affected by it have a right to plead their case; but we feel that it ought not to be in the name of a body which is formed for commercial purposes, and not for advocating political or sectarian interests. We are fully aware that it has been alleged that this Bill will indirectly and remotely affect the commerce of the country, but I feel sure that this is simply a sort of wild and vague fear savouring of an irrational panic, which could hardly be reasonably entertained by any sensible person. We fully admit that the Jurisdiction Bill may be said to affect the European community, and that may be a good reason for them as a body to make such representation as they may deem necessary, but we certainly think that, by itself, it is not sufficient justification for any action to be taken in the name of this Chamber. It is not improbable that legislative measures may hereafter be deemed necessary which may affect one or other of the numerous other communities existing in India, and which may also be, in some remote and indirect way, alleged to affect the commerce of the country. Now I ask you, gentlemen, could this Chamber of Commerce, consisting as it does of the most sensible and practical class of the people, establish by their action this day a precedent which may be quoted as an authority whenever it may be called upon to take up the cudgels for one community or other. I submit, gentlemen, for your careful consideration to-day, whether this Chamber, in the action it proposes to take, is not acting ultra vires and is not pledging itself to take action in matters which are purely and directly only political and involving sectarian interests. We feel satisfied that the resolutions proposed are not within the legitimate province of this Chamber, and we therefore feel it our duty to vote against the same, and to support the amendment just put before you by my friend Mr. Nanabhoy B. Jeejeebhoy."

The CHAIRMAN said that, before putting the resolution to the vote, he would say that, as their Native friends had argued for the most part that it was not competent for the Chamber to take up a question of this kind and discuss it, he would refer the meeting to the rule quoted by Mr. Sorabjee, in which it was stated that the object of the Chamber was "to obtain the removal, as far as such a society can, of all acknowledged grievances affecting merchants as a body, or mercantile interests in general." Section ten of the rules bore more particularly upon the question at issue. It was to the effect that one of the objects of the Chamber was "to discuss any measures of public interest which might arise." He (the Chairman) thought that the present question was a measure of very public interest, and that they were quite competent to discuss it. He thought that the Native gentlemen present that day must be satisfied from what they had heard that there was no wish on the part of any of the speakers to arouse class-prejudices. Every speaker had been very careful to keep the race-question in the background whilst urging in general terms the impropriety of introducing this measure or of pressing it any further.

The amendment was then put to the meeting and lost by a large majority, only the three Native gentlemen who had spoken voting for it. The resolution was then put to the meeting and carried.

MR. SORABJEE asked that the Chairman would record the protest against the discussion of the subject by the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN said that the amendment would go on the records of the Chamber.

MR. SORABJEE said that the protest had not been read.

The CHAIRMAN said that, if the practice was adopted of reading letters at the meetings, the Chairman would have only empty chairs to address. (Hear, hear.)

MR. SORABJEE said that it was usually the custom to send a circular round asking whether such and such a subject should be taken up or not; but this had not been done on the present occasion.

The CHAIRMAN said that a certain amount of discretion must be left in the hands of the Committee.

MR. BYTHELL suggested that the protest should be recorded.

The CHAIRMAN said that the protest had been recorded, and would go on the record of the Chamber.

MR. NANABHOY said the first intimation that he had received that the meeting was to be held was at 2 o'clock on Monday, and he was not in office at the time.

The CHAIRMAN said that Mr. Nanabhoy came to the meeting quite prepared to discuss the matter, and he did not see what he had to complain of. He was informed that the circular calling the meeting was sent to Mr. Nanabhoy's office twice.

MR. NANABHOY: "My house is not far away. I am living at Mazagon. The circular ought to have been sent there." (Cries of "nonsense," "absurd," &c.)

MR. CLEMENT POOLE said: "I beg to propose 'that the following members of the Chamber, namely, the Chairman of the Chamber, Mr. M. Mowat, the Hon'ble W. M. Macaulay, Messrs. Bythell, Russel, L. R. W. Forrest and Blascheck, be appointed a sub-committee, with power to add to their number, to prepare a memorial to the Viceroy praying that His Excellency may be pleased to abandon the proposed alteration in the law.' At this late hour I would not recapitulate the remarks made by the previous speaker, but I will say this, that the names of the committee read out to you are a sufficient guarantee that the memorial which will be presented to Government will be drawn up with moderation and good sense, and will be free from expressions which have reached us from other places." (Applause).

MR. BLASCHECK said: "I second the resolution. I abstain from making any further remarks at this late hour."

The proposition was then put to the meeting and carried.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the proceedings.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The humble memorial of the undersigned European, and Anglo-Indian British subjects residing in the District of North Bhagalpur—

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That Your Excellency's memorialists view with great apprehension Mr. Ilbert's proposed Criminal Code Amendment Bill.

II.—That they consider that this Amendment Bill is quite uncalled for, inasmuch as the Natives of this country enjoy numerous privileges which are denied to Europeans; and that the passing of the proposed measure will subject British-born men and women to the caprices and whims of Native officials, who are utterly ignorant of the habits, customs and feelings of Europeans; and your memorialists are of opinion that Mr. Ilbert's Bill is calculated to militate against their interests and rights as Britons—rights which they proudly maintain throughout the civilised world.

III.—That your memorialists believe that, while the proposed Amendment Bill confers no new advantages on the Natives of this country, it completely deprives Britons of that privilege which they have always been accustomed to look upon as a hereditary right, namely, that of trial by men of their own creed and colour; and that, should Mr. Ilbert's Bill be passed, Natives will be encouraged to institute vexatious and malicious cases in the Criminal Courts, on the most frivolous pretexts, simply with a view to harass and annoy European men and women, which, under the existing Criminal Procedure, they are unable to do.

IV.—That their long and intimate experience of the inhabitants of the Mufassul has shown them that most Natives themselves prefer to submit their lives and property to the impartial justice of European officials, rather than to the somewhat capricious judgment of their own countrymen. Is it to be wondered at, then, that Europeans, too, should concur with them in this respect?

V.—That many cases in which European British subjects are involved require an acute and critical knowledge of their manners and customs; and Your Excellency's memorialists are of opinion that a few years of legal study, even in Europe, are not sufficient to qualify Natives to administer that justice to Europeans which a better knowledge of their habits and sentiments would assure to them.

VI.—That the numerical disproportion between Europeans and Natives tends unmistakably to show that something besides physical force has helped in the subjugation and consolidation of this empire; and that any deprivation of the rights of the former would undermine that great and subtle force of which British prestige forms a not unimportant part.

VII.—That the experiences of the mutiny years shewed that, had it not been for the Europeans of the Mufassal, Government would have found itself powerless against the exigencies of the moment; and that your memorialists are of opinion that those who poured out their blood in defence of that Government are now being but ill-repaid by the deprivation of one of their most cherished rights.

VIII.—In conclusion your memorialists, trusting in the great sagacity and wisdom hitherto displayed by Your Excellency, venture to express their earnest hope that their respectful protest may meet with Your Excellency's serious and favourable consideration.

And Your Excellency's memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Dated 19th April, 1883.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The humble memorial of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce—

SHREWETH,—That your memorialists have considered the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, and they beg respectfully to submit to Your Excellency in Council their deliberate and well-considered views respecting this measure.

Your memorialists venture to think that their views may be worthy of attention, because they, and those with whom they are connected, are brought into direct and intimate relations with the Natives of this country. Those views are based upon long and wide experience. Your memorialists hope, moreover, that the fact that they do not apprehend any personal application of the proposed measure in their own case, and that many of them may probably retire from the country before the fruits of the proposed change mature, will strengthen rather than weaken the force of their opinion. That opinion may not coincide with the sentimental and theoretical views of persons devoid of experience as to the actual circumstances of the country, or of those who ignore differences of race, creed, education and habits; but your memorialists trust that their sentiments deserve to be treated as something far removed from blind panic, unreasoning clamour or factious opposition. It commonly happens, indeed, that Englishmen come to this country imbued with benevolent or sentimental theories, most of which are based on the assumption that political equality between the European and Native races is possible and desirable; but such equality your memorialists consider an illusion, an illusion which has, indeed, a semblance of generosity, but which very slight experience suffices to strip of its specious attractions and altogether to dispel. Those who have not penetrated beneath the plausible surface which the Oriental usually presents to European eyes may continue to cherish such an illusion; but it is impossible for those to do so who, like your memorialists, are brought into daily contact with the various classes of the people in the ordinary transactions of life.

Your memorialists, as a body of mercantile men, are deeply interested in all that may affect the development of the resources of this country. They recognise that their interests as representing European capital in this country are bound up with the security and prosperity of the country, and are, therefore, identical with the true interests of their Native fellow-subjects. Your memorialists feel sure that it is not necessary to press upon the attention of Your Excellency in Council the disastrous effects of insecurity, or even a feeling of insecurity, upon trade and commerce. It is superfluous to insist upon so obvious a fact of experience as the sensitiveness of capital. A sense of insecurity, especially a sense of personal insecurity arising from want of confidence in the administration of criminal justice, cannot fail to paralyze capital and to arrest its flow into the country, while it will unjustly impose serious sacrifices on those who have already invested their capital in reliance upon the existing state of security.

Your memorialists regret that their experience compels them to condemn emphatically the present Bill, and to view with distrust the policy which appears to underlie it.

Your memorialists trust that it is not too late to express such an opinion. They submit that the admission of Natives into the Civil Service does not in the slightest degree preclude objection to the policy of the present measure. The public could scarcely be expected to foresee the present development of that policy, since the Government itself did not contemplate such a result, even down to the framing of the present Criminal Procedure Code. Nor did the large mass of opinions and reports submitted when that Code was in preparation indicate such a result as desirable, much less as inevitable; for, although nearly two hundred opinions were then laid before Your Excellency in Council, only one faintly foreshadowed any such measure. The Government admitted Natives into the Civil Service subject to the restrictions at present existing. Had the Government then contemplated perfect equality of powers, it would doubtless have considered itself bound in fairness to make known its views at that time. Had any such development been foreseen, it would undoubtedly have called forth the same objection as is now urged against the present measure; which measure, it is now said, is a necessary consequence of the step then taken.

Your memorialists further venture to submit that neither the present measure, nor the policy upon which it appears to be based, are necessary or legitimate developments of the spirit of Her Majesty's Proclamation of 1858. If that Proclamation involved such changes as the present Bill contemplates, further advance in the same direction would be inevitable; so that the finality claimed for this measure could not exist. Her Majesty's Proclamation, however, does not profess to prescribe or define the course of future legislation, which is by law placed under the control of Your Excellency in Council.

Nor does Her Majesty's Proclamation declare, or even contemplate, that any larger share in the government or administration of the country than was then enjoyed by the Native races should be conceded to them, or that those races should attain greater power or influence. It declares that, "so far as may be," all Her Majesty's subjects, "of whatever race or creed," shall be freely and impartially admitted "to offices the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability and integrity duly to discharge." This declaration is not confined to any class of Her Majesty's subjects, and leaves their employment to be determined, subject to the existing law, by their fitness and other circumstances of the case.

The Proclamation initiated no new policy.

The view above submitted is that adopted by successive Governments, including the Government which framed and issued the proclamation. Their action shews that they did not consider themselves bound to accord to the Native races any greater share of the administration than the circumstances of the time rendered fitting. To attribute to them a different view would be to charge them with deliberate disregard of the settled policy of the country, since Natives were not, until recently, even eligible for the Civil Service.

Moreover, your memorialists venture to submit that it would not have been competent to Her Most Gracious Majesty, by proclamation, to prescribe the course of future legislation—a consideration which appears conclusive as to the true scope of the Proclamation in question.

Your memorialists, therefore, deem themselves at liberty to consider this proposed measure on its merits, both as regards its policy and its detailed provisions.

The policy of the Bill is set forth in the "Objects and Reasons," and has received further elucidation and development by Your Excellency in Council.

All parties agree in considering that policy to be the policy of forthwith conceding a larger share in the administration to the Native races. The conclusion that this is the policy of the Bill is forced upon your memorialists. The same conclusion is eagerly adopted by the Natives.

Your Excellency's speech in Council appears to confirm this view, since Your Excellency based the defence of the Bill, as your memorialists understand, upon the Queen's Proclamation, which Your Excellency appeared to consider a declaration of the principle of complete equality between the Englishman and the Native. The Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill is to the same effect; for it states that "it was thought anomalous that, while Natives of India were admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the Presidency-towns;" it speaks of "removing the present bar upon the investment of Native Magistrates in the interior with powers over European British subjects," and then proceeds to say—"The Government of India has accordingly decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race-distinctions."

Your memorialists can discover no anomaly in the existing system beyond the natural anomaly that races differ, with the result that the subject race is unfit to govern the dominant race.

The Bill ignores this difference, and, assuming equality for the purposes contemplated, proceeds to bestow, upon certain classes of Natives, a further share in the administration of justice, irrespective of race and as a matter of right. The policy might have been more plainly stated; but it is impossible to escape the conclusion at which all parties have arrived as to its character.

This policy rests upon the assumption that a Native who has attained a certain position in the administration is, in all respects, as well qualified as an Englishman to perform all duties which an Englishman of similar position may be set to perform. To proceed to apply this theory—a theory requiring a bold disregard of fact and experience—to so delicate a matter as the administration of criminal justice between the two races, is surely not warranted, much less required by the Queen's Proclamation. That proclamation expressly provides for actual fitness in the person employed, of whatever race he may be, and significantly points to education and integrity as elements in the qualification. Your memorialists submit that no reasonable person can possibly ignore the difference of character arising from difference of race, or venture to assume that, even with like education and similar surroundings, such difference could be eradicated.

But here the original difference of character is heightened by difference of education, influences, habits, creed and aims. It appears to your memorialists that the policy in question rests upon a confusion of ideas with regard to the Proclamation, namely, that the absence of disability implies fitness.

This policy your memorialists view with the utmost anxiety, and they regard the necessity of discussing it as a public misfortune. They cannot admit the assumption upon which it rests, or allow that a few years in England can possibly qualify Natives of this country to take the same share in the administration of the country as Englishmen. But the Bill does not contemplate that class alone or chiefly, but includes within its purview those educated in this country, surrounded by every influence which tends to widen the gulf of race-distinction.

Your memorialists are fully sensible of the wisdom of laying the foundations of government deep in the welfare of the governed, and they are always ready, when consulted, to approve any well-considered measures tending to the real benefit of the Natives. But your memorialists are convinced that it is cruel to them, and mischievous to the State, to affect to countenance such illusions as the policy of the present Bill seems calculated to encourage. Such illusions, if persisted in, are, in their opinion, calculated to cause grave and serious disaster throughout India, and that, too, at no very remote period of time.

This Bill, when originally brought forward, was rested solely on the ground that it would remove an anomaly. There was no suggestion of administrative difficulty, nor has any such difficulty been suggested as might not be surmounted without public detriment. It has, indeed, been stated that, inasmuch as one-sixth of the Civil Service may consist of Natives, there must ultimately be administrative difficulty; but it is obviously impossible at present to foresee whether it may not be quite easy to overcome that difficulty should it ever occur. It is, at any rate, sufficiently clear that no serious difficulty has at present arisen, or can at present arise. The suggested difficulty is, therefore, purely speculative.

On the other hand, the immediate mischief actually resulting from even the introduction of this Bill is, unfortunately, no longer a matter of speculation. Bitter race-feelings have been evoked by what is felt—and your memorialists think rightly felt—to be an unnecessary, ill-judged and ill-considered attack on justly cherished right. A wise statesmanship would, they venture to think, shrink from evoking such feelings, and would certainly not encounter such mischiefs in pursuit of any merely speculative good. But the harm does not stop there: the proposed tribunals will necessarily invite distrust instead of commanding that public confidence which is essential to the due administration of justice. Here surely is an administrative difficulty of sufficient magnitude to disturb all who value the efficient administration of justice. The mischief, moreover, does not stop even here; for out of the evils indicated mischievous results will arise, at present incalculable—distrust engendered, paralysis of enterprise and discouragement of the naturally loyal: these are but some of the baneful results which may be reasonably apprehended. Such fears, it is said, have been often entertained and as often falsified. It is true that English feeling as to matters affecting the relations between the two races is highly sensitive. This, however, seems to your memorialists the reverse of a reason for disregarding it; seeing that such sensitiveness arises from a perception of the danger involved in any disturbance of the relations at present existing. Your memorialists regret that they cannot admit that such fears have been unfounded in time past, for they feel that the position of Englishmen in India has been lowered, and consequently the foundations of British security perceptibly affected by every similar measure in the past.

Your memorialists, judging from past experience, cannot help fearing that like effects will accrue from the present measure, and that it must tend to deprive Englishmen settled in this country, comparatively few and often widely scattered, of that position which is universally felt to be essential not only to their welfare and to the safety of themselves and their families but also to the very existence of British rule. It is to such settlers that the real acquisition of India as an integral portion of the Empire may be traced and justly credited. It is the beneficent flow of peaceful commerce which has turned the desolation of conquest into fruitful prosperity.

And to what end is society to be thus moved to its depths?

Your memorialists respectfully submit that the susceptibilities of the entire British community deserve to be in the eyes of a British Government as worthy of consideration as the susceptibilities of a new Native officials. There can be no pretence of any injustice to be remedied; for these gentlemen entered the service upon the footing of the existing law, and, indeed, could not have obtained admission on the footing now claimed for them without exciting the same feelings as have now been aroused. The proposed measure seems to your memorialists to be in every way unjust and impolitic, uncalled for by administrative necessity, calculated to evoke feelings of race-antagonism which prudent statesmanship would allow to slumber, tending to create distrust of the policy of Government and to destroy confidence in the administration of the criminal law.

Your memorialists do not desire to dwell unnecessarily upon the details of the proposed measure. They venture, however, to call attention to a singular inconsistency in the utterances in Council respecting one provision of the Bill. The supposition that a Native would never be appointed a Cantonment Magistrate was welcomed as obviating what could not be denied to be a danger—the danger, namely, of allowing British soldiers to be tried by Native Magistrates. But surely it is part of the anomaly sought to be removed that a Native should not be so appointed; and it is strange to set about removing one anomaly in reliance upon the existence of another. The satisfaction, however, created by the existence of that anomaly is rudely shaken when it is remembered that a Cantonment Magistrate may become subordinate to a Native Collector, who, as his superior magisterial officer, is in the exercise of his discretion entitled to assume jurisdiction in criminal cases ordinarily triable by a Cantonment Magistrate.

The Bill also, while empowering Natives to try Europeans, excludes Europeans from such functions; unless, indeed, such Europeans are members of the Covenanted Civil Service, Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, or Cantonment Magistrates. The Bill, therefore, in pursuit, as is professed, of race-equality, creates race-inequality, and disqualifies, as was pointed out in Your Excellency's Council, a considerable and useful class of Magistrates, who would otherwise have exercised the function of trying Europeans with benefit to the community, as numerous members of this class have hitherto done.

In conclusion, your memorialists feel confident that Your Excellency in Council, solicitous for the welfare and prosperity of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, will accept the results of practical experience, and will give such weight as may be due to the views herein submitted. If, as your memorialists trust, those views recommend themselves as just,—if the opinion of your memorialists is, as they venture to hope, entitled to weight, as representing the feeling of the European mercantile community,—if Your Excellency in Council is satisfied that in passing this measure you will be disregarding the feeling of the mercantile and European community, even should that feeling fail to meet with sympathy from Your Excellency in Council,—then your memorialists cannot doubt that Your Excellency in Council will not shrink, in the interests of good government, from withdrawing the present Bill without further delay—a result for which your memorialists humbly pray.

Dated 19th April, 1883.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The humble memorial of the Committee of the Orissa People's Association, Cuttack.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists find themselves in duty bound to convey to Your Excellency their sincere and heartfelt gratitude for the introduction into Your Excellency's Council of the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, with a view to remove certain invidious distinctions as to the trial of Native and European criminals—distinctions the existence of which is a stigma to a Christian Government, to a Government that professes to rule according to principles of justice and piety.

That, in doing so, they heartily agree with the British Indian and other Indian Associations and Societies in not convening a public meeting for contradicting the statement that the Natives are not interested in the measure for the reasons stated by them, namely, for avoiding unpleasantness by setting class against class and embittering feelings. For similar reasons, Your Excellency's memorialists content themselves with presenting this humble memorial at the same time feeling assured that, when Your Excellency's Government, in the discharge of its just and righteous duties, has taken up the matter, after noticing the growing discontent among the Indian nations expressed in several of their public papers, the Amendment Bill will be passed, and that all the attempts of its enemies to prevent it will prove fruitless.

That Your Excellency's memorialists further beg to state that, in some of the public papers of England, it is stated that the Natives are not at all interested in the said Amendment Bill of the Criminal Procedure Code, and that for that reason they do not agitate the point in question. But Your Excellency's memorialists humbly beg to state that the current of such agitations has from a distant past been running down to the present day, and that the editors of those papers make such a statement out of ignorance, or wilfully represent the fact to influence the minds of the hon'ble members of the British Parliament.

That Your Excellency's memorialists entertain ardent hopes that, by removing all distinctions of race, country and religion, Your Excellency will firmly establish the glory of Her Majesty's Government in India.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To—The Officiating Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

We are directed by the Council of the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association to forward herewith,* in original, a memorial from the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian European British subjects, residents of Monghyr, on the subject of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, and to request that you will forward it through the proper channel to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

* A memorial in original from the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian European British subjects, residents of Monghyr.
One annexure, extracts from the memorial of the inhabitants of Cawnpore, paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The memorial of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian European British subjects, residents of Monghyr in Bengal.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists have learnt with deep concern the proposed amendment in the Criminal Procedure Code whereby Native Magistrates in the Mufassal have been vested with criminal jurisdiction over European British-born subjects.

That your memorialists have seen and considered the memorial of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association to Your Excellency on the subject.

That your memorialists fully appreciate and concur in the views and reasons therein expressed and given against the introduction of the proposed change in the existing law, and your memorialists pray that the same may be taken and read as part of this their memorial.

That your memorialists have also seen and considered the memorial of the inhabitants of Cawnpore to Your Excellency on the same subject.

That your memorialists entirely endorse the views expressed in paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 (copies of which are hereto annexed) of the said memorial, and pray that the same may also be taken and read as part of this their memorial.

Your memorialists therefore humbly pray that the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill may not be passed.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

Extracts from Memorial of Inhabitants of Cawnpore.

Paragraph 5.—Your memorialists are also strongly convinced that no change in the law is necessary or expedient, and they most earnestly deprecate any further attempts on the part of those Europeans in India whose power is great, but whose presence is temporary and not permanent, to encourage the Natives of India to agitate for positions in the administration and government of India on the principle of equality, while the following indisputable facts exist, namely :—

- (a) The Natives of India are admittedly subject races, bearing the greatest enmity and animosity towards each other, dependent on European soldiers to keep the peace, and, except an insignificant number of individuals in the Presidency-towns (who owe everything to compulsory education and contact with Europeans), are wholly unfit for independence.
- (b) They have unquestionably more of liberty, peace and protection than any other people in the world who are subject to foreign dominion.
- (c) They already stand equal before the law, subject to the same Penal and Civil Codes as the dominant race.
- (d) They have the benefit of personal laws to a greater extent than Europeans, Natives of rank and women being exempted from attendance in Courts of Justice.
- (e) The number of Europeans in India are comparatively so small that to admit and enforce the principle of equality without reservation and without considerations of race or feeling in every department would reduce British power in India to a cypher and make the British occupation of India unmaintainable, and eventually produce the same state of anarchy and disorder that prevailed before its conquest by the British.

The principle of equality has no application among the Natives themselves, as their domestic and social institutions prove.

Paragraph 6.—Your memorialists further submit that, with so many indications present in the minds of the people of India, namely :—

- (a) for their acknowledged unfitness for independence or self-government ;
- (b) of their, with few exceptions, acknowledged unfitness to exercise jurisdiction over the liberty and lives of even their own fellow-countrymen ;
- (c) of the necessity for excluding them from exercising any power except under proper safeguards ;

(d) of the necessity for excluding them from appointments in the army, and taking part in the defence of their country against disturbers of the pax Britannica;

to propose to grant them the principle of equality to the extent of permitting them to sit in judgment upon members of the dominant race seems to your memorialists residing in the Mufassal an unnecessary and dangerous innovation, which for many generations to come (your memorialists speaking on behalf of their wives and children) will never calmly acquiesce in or submit to.

Paragraph 7.—Your memorialists unhesitatingly aver that, should this Bill pass (which has already been spoken of by the Native papers as “an instalment” of what is to follow), there will be no adequate security or safety for your memorialists and European residents in the Mufassal, and the present peaceful state of India will, on the punishment of a European by a Native, be liable to disturbances of such a character as, if once set on foot, will produce greater anarchy and disorder than has been known in India for centuries.

Paragraph 8.—Your memorialists would further observe that they perceive in this Bill, in which the principle of equality is affirmed, the prelude to others of a similar character calculated to destroy British interests in, and exclude Europeans from, Mufassal India. That, if such is the ultimate aim and policy of the Government of India, your memorialists submit that the same should be boldly announced and notified to your memorialists and the thousands of Europeans entering into and settling in the country.

No. 2345, dated 2nd May, 1883.

From—R. D. MORRISON, Esq., for Agent, Eastern Bengal Railway Company,

To—The Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India.

In accordance with a resolution come to at a meeting of the European employés of this Company held at Sealdah on the 5th March, 1883, I have the honour to transmit herewith a memorial duly signed by all the European British-born employés of the Company, and to solicit that it may be laid before His Excellency the Viceroy.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the Marquis of Ripon, K.G., P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The memorial of the European British-born employés of the Eastern Bengal Railway Company

MOST HUMBLY AND RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—1. That your memorialists have read with much concern the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill which was introduced into your Excellency's Council by the Honourable Mr. Ilbert on the 2nd February, 1883, by which it is sought to invest Native Civil Servants with jurisdiction over European British subjects in criminal cases.

2. That your memorialists humbly submit that they have a constitutional right to be tried only by their peers and their countrymen, and that in India they have always enjoyed the right of being tried by men of their own nationality, and have done nothing whatever to forfeit that right.

3. That it was with this knowledge that your memorialists have such a right, and with no apprehension that they should not continue to enjoy it, that many of your memorialists took service in this country, and encouraged by their employers, brought out their families and domiciled them here.

4. That although the Natives of India have by force of conquest become subjects of the British Crown, they are still aliens both in nationality and religion; and a European British subject appearing before a Court presided over by a Native Magistrate or Judge would be essentially before a foreign tribunal, without the advantage of that Consular protection which he would be entitled to in a foreign country.

5. That, in the humble opinion of your memorialists, the proposed amendment of the existing law is not only inopportune but is calculated to engender class-feeling and race-antagonism, which your memorialists, who are collaborators with a very large number of Native Railway employés, cannot too strongly deprecate as being injurious in the extreme to European and Native alike and to the public service generally.

6. That your memorialists would draw your attention to the fact that no dissatisfaction has been expressed by the Native community generally on the subject of the immunity from Native jurisdiction now enjoyed by European British subjects, and that none of their privileges have been affected by the existing order of things. In proof that the present law, as a piece of class-legislation, has been a success, and that cases coming under it should be enquired into and tried by trained European Magistrates, your memorialists beg to quote the opinion expressed by the Honourable the Legal Member of Council at the meeting of your Excellency's Council on the 2nd ultimo, in which he said—“And as to facts with which we have to deal, no one who has studied the statistics and reports of the cases involving charges against European British subjects can fail to be struck with two things: first, that, as compared with the great mass of ordinary criminal business, they are exceptionally rare; and, secondly, that they are exceptionally troublesome and difficult."

7. That your memorialists as Railway employés are more likely to be injuriously affected by the proposed change in the law in respect of jurisdiction over European British subjects than other classes of the European community: first, on account of, in many cases, their isolation at stations far removed from European centres and Courts of revisional jurisdiction; and secondly, owing to the great amount of technical and scientific evidence that is usually introduced into Railway criminal cases, and which would be almost, if not quite, unintelligible to a Native Magistrate; whilst a protracted trial, with all the expense attendant thereon, followed probably by an erroneous and perhaps ruinous judgment, might not unreasonably be expected from the Judge's want of technical knowledge and experience in subjects with which European Judges are all more or less acquainted.

8. That your memorialists, whilst fully and cordially recognizing the right of Natives to a share in the administration of the laws of this country, beg to point out that the proposed amendment, if it becomes law, will place European British subjects at a disadvantage when compared with the mass of the population of India, as they will then be subject to the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judges whose ideas of western civilization, manners and thought will have been gained only in India or during two or three years' study in England at some English tutor's or cramming establishment, preparing for the Civil Service; whereas now European British subjects are triable only by highly trained and educated Englishmen, who have an intimate knowledge of their inner life, habits and manners which it is impossible for their Native coadjutors to obtain.

9. That your memorialists would draw attention to the fact that a Native Magistrate of any class exercises, under section 445 of the Criminal Procedure Code, nearly if not all the powers which a Justice of the Peace can exercise in England, inasmuch as he can issue process of arrest, making it returnable to himself or to any other Magistrate having jurisdiction.

10. That your memorialists would deprecate any argument founded on the basis that, because Natives exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects in Presidency-towns, they should therefore exercise that jurisdiction outside Presidency-towns as obviously misleading, seeing that the respective positions are widely different. In a Presidency-town, any high-handed proceeding of a Native Magistrate would not of necessity imperil the liberty of the subject, as an immediate application could be made to the High Court, and a suspensory writ obtained within an hour; but in the Mufassal the European British subject would be entirely at the mercy of the local Native authority, and would be liable to be degraded by a week's imprisonment, perhaps with hard labour, before a distant High Court could be moved by the most energetic advocate to suspend the sentence.

11. That your memorialists, in conclusion, would respectfully submit that the protection which has been hitherto afforded them by the existing law is no more than they are entitled to under the British Constitution: and, as Muhammadans, Hindus, Parsis and many other races and sects in India are protected in the exercise of their own peculiar laws and customs by class-legislation, your memorialists pray that the rights and liberty so dear to them, and which are menaced by the proposed amendment, may not be withdrawn.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the Marquis of Ripon, Viceroy and Governor General in Council.

Memorial of Ladies residing in Bihar.

MY LORD,—You have expressed yourself as willing to listen to any remonstrances against the proposed change in the Criminal Procedure Code which are based on arguments consistent with the declared policy of the Crown and Parliament. We, who are Englishwomen living in Bihar, ask you to listen to our remonstrances; for the mainspring of that policy is justice to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and we submit that, should the provisions of Mr. Ilbert's Bill become law, they will do us grievous wrong.

Our grounds for remonstrating as Englishwomen against the proposed change in the Criminal Procedure Code are as follows:—

I.—We have no reason to expect that Native Judges will do us justice. We do not raise the question of their integrity, nor do we impute to them any want of will to be just. Our argument is that they can have no such knowledge of the characters and motives of civilised and educated women as shall fit them to judge them.

We see that in the social systems of India women are ignorant and enslaved. We see that up to this time the vast efforts of philanthropists have effected comparatively nothing to redeem them. We see the men of their races insensible to their degradation, if not contented with it. Therefore, we assert that men born or bred on such a system are unfitted to become the judges of women of a totally different type of society.

II.—Believing, as we do, that we cannot expect justice at the hands of Native Judges, in consequence of their ignorance of us, we beg to point out that one of the greatest of social evils would follow from the carrying into law of the provisions of Mr. Ilbert's Bill, namely, a considerable class of those amenable to them would be exposed to the uncertainty and anxiety which wait upon distrust of the efficiency of the administration of the law.

III.—We have no desire to add to the torrent of angry words which the proposed change in the Criminal Procedure Code has excited, but in conclusion we entreat you, for the sake of peace and concord, to withdraw this Bill. The harm which has already been done can never be undone, but possibly may be mitigated by removing the cause. It appears to us that the good it purposes to effect is truly insignificant compared with the evil it has caused and would continue to cause. We cannot expect you, in your high position, to appreciate the difficulties we feel in the way of cementing friendliness between ourselves and our Native neighbours; but these difficulties exist, and we earnestly and deliberately say that your proposal has added to them. We entreat you again, in justice to us, to listen to our prayer that you will withdraw this Bill. We, too, have been confided to your care by our Queen, and we, too, claim your consideration and justice.

Dated 26th April, 1883.

From—C. H. BROWNE, Esq., Honorary Secretary, Mysore Planters' Association,
To His Excellency the Governor General of India in Council.

I have the honour to inclose your Lordship a copy of resolutions passed at meeting of the Mysore Planters' Association held in Chukmuglew on 19th ultimo, and pray that your Lordship may give the same due consideration, as being the expressed opinion of a body of European gentlemen, many of whom have spent a great portion of their lives amongst the Natives of India.

Resolutions passed at an Extraordinary General Meeting of Mysore Planters' Association held in Chukmuglew on 19th March, 1883.

I.—That gentlemen not members of this Association be admitted to this meeting.

II.—That, in the opinion of this Association, the alteration in the law proposed by Government, in the Bill entitled a Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, demands the concerted opposition of the European community throughout India, as being an unnecessary sacrifice of a highly prized and necessary right to ideal legislation, as certain to depreciate the value of European capital invested in the Mufassal, and as certain to lead to the harassing of the European in the Criminal Courts.

III.—That the President and Honorary Secretary of this Association be appointed to take such steps in opposing this Bill as may be deemed most expedient, and to receive subscriptions towards the fund opened by the Chamber of Commerce, Madras, for the purpose of defraying expenses incurred in the opposition.

IV.—That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Resident of Mysore for his information, and with a request that he will forward the same to the Governor General in Council; also one to the Chamber of Commerce, Madras, with a hearty vote of thanks for the action taken by that body in defence of a privilege so necessary to the European in the Mufassal.

V.—That, in addition to the subscriptions guaranteed by the sub-associations to the fund inaugurated by the Chamber of Commerce, a subscription list be circulated amongst the Europeans in this district, whether members of this Association or not.

2. The opinions noted in the margin have been received and considered, and are forwarded for the information of the Government of India. Other opinions will be forwarded when received, but the Governor in Council has felt that the matter has now been so thoroughly discussed that he need no longer delay the submission of his own opinion.

3. The effect of the Bill is that, whereas at present no persons other than European British subjects can be vested with jurisdiction over such subjects unless they be Judges of the High Courts or Magistrates of the Presidency towns, it is proposed that such jurisdiction shall be made exercisable—

- (1) by all Native Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ;
- (2) by such (a) Native members of the service known as the Covenanted Civil Service, whether appointed by competition or nomination, (b) Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, and (c) Cantonment Magistrates, as may be found fit.

4. The objects of the change are understood to be—

- (1) to remove the anomaly that Natives who are admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial functions should be held incompetent to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans outside the Presidency towns, and
- (2) to remove all distinctions of race in the determination of the Magistrates, other than District Magistrates, who can be vested with this jurisdiction.

5. As regards so much of the Bill as would give effect to the first object which the Governor in Council understands to apply solely to the case of Native Sessions Judges and District Magistrates, His Excellency is of opinion that it would be proper that the jurisdiction in question should be given to all Native Civilians who attain those responsible positions. An opinion of the Bombay Government to this effect was communicated in my letter No. 4622 of 28th July last, and to this opinion the present Government adheres for the following reasons :—

(a) Native District Magistrates when appointed, which will probably not be for several years, will be persons highly trusted and found fit to have European Assistants, and it would be anomalous and affronting to their self-respect that they should have less jurisdiction than their Assistants. The sorts and degrees of jurisdiction to be assigned to other magisterial officers of the mofussil are left to the discretion of Government according to its sense of what is best for the general public interests. But it is the obvious intention of the law that a District Magistrate should exercise ex-officio the full magisterial function in all its branches. He is charged with responsibility for the peace of his district ; his position is exceptional and conspicuous ; and if a Native, his duty in relation to Europeans will be discharged under moral guarantees for care and rectitude not inferior to those which operate in the case of Magistrates in the Presidency towns.

(b) Native Sessions Judges should have the jurisdiction because if fit for the ordinary duties of such high judicial office they will, in the opinion of this Government, be competent to preside over the trial of Europeans, associated as they must be with assessors or jury, of whom not less than half will be Europeans if so desired by the person tried ; and because it might often be very inconvenient to Government and a hardship to Europeans and all persons concerned that there should be no authority in a district with power to sentence a European British subject to more than three months' imprisonment.

6. Considering, however, that this estimate of the competency of Native Sessions Judges, however supported by the opinions of experienced European officials, is not yet shared by the general European public, the Governor in Council would add the recommendation that in the event of the jurisdiction being given to Native Sessions Judges, any European accused, whether brought before a European or Native Sessions Judge, should have the right to be tried by jury even though the jury system may not have been extended by Government to the district in which the trial is held. In the mofussil a jury must be composed of an uneven number not more than 9 nor less than 3 ; a European accused may claim that at least half, which must be more than half, shall be Europeans ; the verdict proceeds from the majority, and the Sessions Judge if differing can only refer the case to the High Court. Should the Sessions Judge concur with the majority and pass sentence, the alleged severity of such sentence can still be appealed against to the High Court as if it were a point of law.

The law provides for many distinctions in the procedure applicable to Europeans and Natives ; but there is no matter in which Europeans by virtue of their national customs could claim a distinction more reasonably than that of trial by jury. The distinction would also be in harmony with the existing law which enables the Government to introduce the jury system in such districts and for the trial of such particular class of cases as it thinks proper. Under the late Code of Criminal Procedure (Act X of 1872) Europeans not being British subjects actually possessed the right which, it is now suggested, should be conferred on all Europeans, whether British subjects or not.

With the safeguards which the jury system affords no reasonable objection could be taken by Europeans to trial by Native Sessions Judges.

As regards so much of the Bill as would give effect to the second object, the Governor in Council is of opinion that the time has not arrived when all race distinction should be eliminated from magisterial qualification.

As a preliminary observation, His Excellency would submit that the total removal of race distinction appears to be impossible unless the Government either submits to a great restriction of their present practice in the matter of appointing Europeans to be Justices of the Peace in the mofussil, or extends the qualification for receiving such office to Native Magistrates occupying many positions besides those mentioned in the Bill.

Political Agents who have to try Europeans committing offences in Native States can be made Justices of the Peace under the separate provisions of Section 6 of the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act of 1879, but as regards British territory outside the Presidency towns, the Bill as it stands would debar the Government from appointing any European to be a Justice of the Peace unless he happened to be a member of the Covenanted Civil Service, an Assistant Commissioner or a Cantonment Magistrate. But the necessities of our administration have hitherto from time to time required that the office should be conferred on Europeans filling many other positions, as for instance officers of the Staff Corps or Uncovenanted Service employed as Railway or City Magistrates and Medical Officers superintending sanatoria. Officers again are made Justices of the Peace for purposes other than the trial of Europeans, as for instance Military Officers for attesting enlistments, and Commissioners or Deputy Commissioners of Customs for adjudicating on goods liable to confiscation (Section 20 of Act XXIX of 1857).

Again, the Act as it stands would debar Government from utilising the services of non-official Europeans as Honorary Magistrates and Justices of the Peace for the control of their countrymen in particular localities. In this connection the total abolition of race distinction could not be maintained unless the qualification were extended to every Native of British India who might be made a 1st class Magistrate.

In the opinion of this Government no restriction whatever should be placed on the liberty of Government to utilise the services of European British subjects as Justices of the Peace at their discretion, and a distinction of race must at least continue to this extent that while all European British subjects are qualified for the office, only those Natives can be qualified who fill certain specified positions.

8. Attention being next confined to the question of the particular positions which should entitle Natives to the qualification, the Governor in Council proceeds to remark that the question put to him last year was whether all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service or at least those who have attained the position of District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, should be entrusted with jurisdiction over Europeans. The Government were then of opinion that the jurisdiction should be given to those only who become District Magistrates or Sessions Judges. To this opinion (subject to the suggestion in paragraph 16, clause b) the Governor in Council adheres, and it follows that he would not extend the jurisdiction either to Native Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, or to Cantonment Magistrates before whom, moreover, European soldiers and their wives are frequently brought. As no Native Officer of the Indian Army may sit on the Court-Martial of an English soldier, so should no Native be appointed a Cantonment Magistrate. In fact the instructions of the Secretary of State have hitherto been precise that only Military officers are to be so appointed.

9. After the public discussion of the question that has taken place, the Governor in Council feels bound to state why he holds that the jurisdiction should not be extended to Native Magistrates other than District Magistrates, although he is averse from relying on any of the numerous reasons that have been put forward, about which there is difference of opinion not only between Natives and Europeans, but also among the Europeans themselves.

He conceives it to be indisputable that Government must recognise the fact of the unwillingness of Europeans to be tried by Native Magistrates, and the bad consequences that are almost certain to ensue if this unwillingness be ignored—consequences involving disorder in our Courts of Justice and constant revivals of ill-feeling between the two races.

10. So far as this unwillingness is based on the idea of race superiority, it has not the sympathy of the Governor in Council, for no superiority is likely to be apparent when the European race is represented by a prisoner at the bar and the Native race by a highly educated and carefully chosen Magistrate. But the unwillingness is based also on the difference between the language, feelings and social customs of the two races, and however much its reasonableness even on this ground may be disputed, the Governor in Council is certain that it is honestly believed to be reasonable by the majority of Europeans.

In answer to this consideration the public exponents of Native views have urged that, so far as the appreciating faculty is concerned, Native Magistrates are as competent to try Europeans as European Magistrates are to try Natives. The Governor in Council concurs in this remark. Such disadvantage as arises from the difference of race is common to both cases. Indeed the Natives who learn English from their early youth, and increasingly adopt it for their own purposes, speak and understand English far better than most Englishmen speak and understand the vernaculars—and the inner life of Europeans is not more a sealed book to outside observers than that of Natives. But the distinction taken is this: The Natives are content to be tried by Europeans in spite of the difference of race which becomes, in fact, a positive advantage in proportion as it is desirable that an adjudicator should be cut off from all the social connection through which influences might reach his mind. The Europeans on the other hand, unaffected by any compensatory considerations, dislike, as they have always and everywhere disliked, the idea of being tried by persons not of their own race.

11. Their feeling partakes of intelligible anxiety in the case of those, seldom to be found in this Presidency, who are isolated from the community of their fellow-countrymen. It is impossible to ignore the propensity of the common people in India to resort to the Criminal Courts for the attainment of their various objects, the facility with which false witnesses for any purpose can be hired in every town and village, and the encouragement that would probably be given to false charges as against Europeans, regarded as intruders on the land, by the fact that they could be brought before Native Magistrates. The Magistrate's impartiality would be an imperfect safeguard against the risk, and no safeguard against the annoyance to which the objects of such false charges would be exposed.

12. Their feeling again would naturally take an extreme form in relation to the trial of women. There is no point of contrast between Europeans and Natives so striking as the positions of consideration and disparagement assigned to women in their respective social systems. The apprehension that a European woman tried by a Native Magistrate might be treated with what would be regarded as inconsiderateness in European estimation, cannot be put aside as wholly unreasonable. Nor could it be easily obviated by attention to the Magistrate's qualifications, because the highest educational attainments may co-exist with hereditary prepossessions.

Our laws of procedure, civil and criminal, deviate* from the strict principles of English law * Section 640 of Code of Civil Procedure. in consideration of oriental sensitiveness on the subject of the appearance of women in Courts of Justice.

13. The Governor in Council will next advert to the circumstance that Natives are now admitted to the ranks of the Covenanted Civil Service in the proportion of one in six; and to meet the argument that if it can be foreseen that the time must come when it will be absolutely necessary to vest them with jurisdiction over Europeans, the change should be effected as gradually as possible and a beginning should now be made, he would reply that administrative inconvenience may be undoubtedly incurred if the Native Sessions Judges are denied the jurisdiction, but the proportion of European Magistrates in the districts will always be so large that no necessity need be anticipated of the employment of any Native Civilian Magistrate in the trial of Europeans. In the 5th paragraph it has been shown that the position of a District Magistrate requires that he should be vested with the full magisterial function ex-officio.

14. Due note has been taken of the fact that the proposal in the Bill is not that all Native Civilian Magistrates should have jurisdiction over Europeans, but that the Governments should have the power to vest them with such jurisdiction when specially qualified to exercise it, but the Governor in Council would submit in answer that the exercise by the Governments of their proposed discretion, whether in giving or withholding the jurisdiction, would be a difficult and invidious task, liable constantly to cause either dissatisfaction to Europeans or disappointment to Natives. It is probable that the discretion would be variously exercised by the Administrations of different Provinces, and by successive Administrations in the same Province. If on the whole it is very sparingly exercised, there will be a notable disparity between the effect of the new law and the pre-announcement of its principles. And in any case the whole change of law and practice effected would constitute so small a step towards the desired end of perfect equality of Natives and Europeans before the law, that it is not worth while for the sake of it to offend the European community by depriving them of a statutory protection to which they attach the highest value.

15. The satisfaction that the change would afford to the Natives would, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, be insignificant in comparison with the pain it would cause to the Europeans. The real feelings of the Natives are not to be judged by the theoretical claims put forward in a heated controversy. Judging from the previous tone of the Native Press in articles dealing with every topic of constitutional opposition, the Governor in Council believes that their sense of propriety has not been offended by the fact that the Europeans, who fill so strange a place in their community, are brought under special rules of criminal procedure and a special jurisdiction. They have seen, moreover, how little jurisdiction over Europeans is allowed even to European Magistrates outside the Presidency towns, and the Governor in Council can hardly doubt that the Native Magistrates themselves have been glad to be excused the jurisdiction altogether.

16. The mere disability therefore of Natives in this matter is not one that the Governor in Council can regard in the light of a serious political grievance. But it remains to consider whether an exceptional arrangement by which justice to Europeans is secured in the interests of public order involves practical injustice to their Native fellow-subjects. His Excellency has given careful consideration to the allegations that have been advanced on this head by Native leaders in the present controversy. They appear to be only two in number:—

- (a) The first is that owing to the paucity of European Magistrates in the districts, Natives who suffer slight wrongs at the hands of Europeans experience such trouble in finding a Magistrate qualified to entertain their complaints, that they perforce forego redress, and the commission of similar wrongs is thereby encouraged. Those, however, who prefer this complaint are perhaps ignorant of Section 445 of the Code, which would enable the nearest Native Magistrate to take the same cognizance of an offence committed by a European as he could if committed by a Native, and also to issue process to compel his appearance, provided it be made returnable before a Magistrate having jurisdiction to try the case. The trouble of afterwards appearing with witnesses before the trying Magistrate would be common to both parties, and probably far more irksome to the European defendant than to the Native complainant; and the fact that he could be exposed to it through the instrumentality of a Native Magistrate appears as complete a precaution as the law could devise for checking the impression that Europeans can commit petty wrongs on Natives with impunity.

- (b) The second alleged ground of complaint is that European Magistrates are disposed to be unduly lenient to European offenders. Every case must be judged on its own merits and the Governor in Council will give no general opinion on the justice of this complaint, but he considers that the feelings of the Natives on the subject are natural and entitled to sympathetic consideration. He considers also that it is desirable to place the true motives of our legislation beyond suspicion. In his opinion, however, the amendment which the law requires for the reasonable satisfaction of the Natives on this head is not to allow the trial of Europeans by unaided Natives, but to give District Magistrates and other controlling authority power to order that any case appearing to call for such procedure should be tried by a Native Magistrate and a European Magistrate associated on one Bench, with provision for reference to the High Court in the event of their differing as to the verdict or sentence.

The change of law suggested could be effected by a short and natural addition to paras. 15 and 16 of the present Code of Criminal Procedure which provide for the appointment of Benches of Magistrates.

17. The Native Magistrate to whom this limited jurisdiction might be given should be of a specified magisterial class, for instance the 1st class, but not necessarily members of the Civil Service. In fact, in these recommendations no account is taken of the privileges of the Civil Service. If privileges are to be considered, there is no reason why the privileges of a few Native Civilians should outweigh those of the whole European community. Nor is there any gain in removing an invidious distinction between the powers of European and Native Civilian Magistrates by creating an equally, if not more, invidious distinction between Native Civilian Magistrates, of whom the great majority will owe their position to nomination, and the experienced men who are now filling the office of 1st Class Magistrate in the higher ranks of the Native Uncovenanted Service.

18. The recommendations of this Government then are (1) that District Magistrates and Sessions Judges should have the jurisdiction ex-officio; (2) that Europeans brought for trial before any Sessions Judge should have the right to claim a jury; (3) that provision should be made for the trial of cases likely to excite race antagonism by a European and Native Magistrate associated on the same Bench. Before deciding to make these recommendations, the Governor in Council submitted them as suggestions for the consideration of the Judges of the High Court and of the Advocate General and Legal Remembrancer. From the appended answers it will be seen that they have not received much support, but neither have any objections of weight been made against them, nor has any alternative proposal been suggested which the Governor in Council can prefer.

19. In the opinion of this Government, if the modifications of the Bill now proposed be regarded as no more than a compromise, it is one by which the Europeans will practically lose nothing and the Natives will gain. And if those authorities are correct who anticipate that it will not satisfy either party, the Governor in Council is confident that the dissatisfaction will be of the nature that subsides, whereas it is not likely that the adoption of an extreme course in either direction would be the final settlement of the dispute.

The following passage is extracted from the excellent speech lately made by the Sheriff of Bombay, Mr. Raghunáth Náráyan Khoté, C.I.E., at a meeting of Natives in the Town Hall: "It has been in the anxious contemplation of some people whether a medium course (and this is a fit case for a compromise) is not possible—such as might meet the convenience of the administration of criminal justice by the State—a course which, whilst it answered on the one hand the objections raised by the European population, would remove the disability of which the Natives could justly complain. Such a happy compromise would prevent the heart-burning between the two races, which is calculated to be daily increased if the present measure passed into law; for whenever any case involving race prejudices arose, the sore would open and keep festering."

Attention is also requested to the appended opinions of Mr. R. N. Khoté, C.I.E., the Honourable Mr. Badrudin Tyabji, and Sir Jamsetji Jijibhoy, who are distinguished representatives of the Hindu, Musalman and Pársi sections of the Bombay community.

20. The only technical argument that has been brought forward against the proposal to allow the Europeans a jury, is that the cases tried, being such only as would properly carry sentences not exceeding one year's imprisonment, will be of a petty character not usually submitted to juries. But a jury in a mofussil Court is a very different thing from a jury in England, and may consist only of three persons.

21. The only proposals for the modification of the Bill that have been suggested by persons whom this Government has consulted, and which call for remark, are three:—

- (a) The first would simply extend the jurisdiction as ex-officio to District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, and go no farther. The opinion first given by this Government in July last was limited to this effect. But the great public interest that has since been taken in the question has led the Governor in Council now to regard the proposal as an incomplete satisfaction of the demands, whether of Natives or Europeans. There is reason to fear that it would be treated as a mere instalment in the settlement of the question. Moreover, the additional provisions which the Governor in Council has ventured to suggest should, in his opinion, be passed as being just in themselves, irrespective of the exigencies of the present controversy.

- (b) The second proposal is that Native Magistrates of the 1st class should be declared competent to try European British subjects if they make no objection. This appears to be already possible at the discretion of the Magistrate under Section 154 of the present Code. A provision by which a European accused could actually elect between a Native and a European Judge would certainly have the advantage of testing the reality of the objection of Europeans to be tried by Natives. But regarded as a compromise in a dispute which is mainly of sentimental importance, it can hardly be supposed that it would be satisfactory to the Natives to find that the exercise of jurisdiction by Native Magistrates had been transferred from the discretion of the Government to the discretion of European offenders. Also the proposal is open to the objection that it would enable an accused person to flatter his Judge.
- (c) The third proposal is a variation on the mixed-Bench proposal adopted by this Government, and is to the effect that Native Magistrates of the 1st class should have the jurisdiction subject to the right of the accused European to claim to be tried by a mixed Bench. It is open to the same objections as the proposal last mentioned.

22. Finally, the Governor in Council trusts it may be borne in mind that so far as his opinions can have value from acquaintance with the feelings and interests of the people concerned, they must be taken as applicable solely to the Bombay Presidency. There is a great difference between the Natives of different parts of India, and this Government is in no position to judge how far and in what aspects the solution of the present question is of greater moment to Europeans circumstanced as they are in Bengal than to the Europeans of this Presidency. At the same time His Excellency desires to express the hope that Europeans in all parts of India would acknowledge the sufficiency of the modifications of the Bill above proposed to secure entire justice to themselves, and would approve the extension of equal guarantees for justice to their Native fellow-subjects.

Extracts from the Code of Criminal Procedure, Act X of 1882, and other laws referred to in letter to the Government of India, No. 3232 of the 11th May, 1883.

Section 274 of Act X of 1882 (paragraph 6).

274. In trials before the High Court the jury shall consist of nine persons.

In trials by jury before the Court of Session, the jury shall consist of such uneven number not being less than three, or more than nine, as the local Government, by order applicable to any particular district or to any particular class of offences in that district, may direct.

Section 307 of Act X of 1882 (paragraph 6).

307. If in any such case the Sessions Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jurors, or of a majority of the jurors, on all or any of the charges on which the accused has been tried, so completely that he considers it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court, he shall submit the case accordingly, recording the grounds of his opinion, and, when the verdict is one of acquittal, stating the offence which he considers to have been committed.

Whenever the Judge submits a case under this section, he shall not record judgment of acquittal or of conviction on any of the charges on which the accused has been tried, but he may either remand the accused to custody or admit him to bail.

In dealing with the case so submitted the High Court may exercise any of the powers which it may exercise on an appeal; but it may acquit or convict the accused of any offence of which the jury could have convicted him upon the charge framed and placed before it; and, if it convicts him, may pass such sentence as might have been passed by the Court of Session.

Section 418 of Act X of 1882 (paragraph 6).

418. An appeal may lie on a matter of fact as well as a matter of law, except where the trial was by jury, in which case the appeal shall lie on a matter of law only.

Explanation.—The alleged severity of a sentence shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be a matter of law.

Section 269 of Act X of 1882 (paragraph 6).

269. The local Government may, by order in the official Gazette, direct that the trial of all offences, or of any particular class of offences, before any Court of Session, shall be by jury in any district, and may revoke or alter such order.

When the accused is charged at the same trial with several offences, of which some are and some are not triable by jury, he shall be tried by jury for all such offences.

Section 234 of Act X of 1872 repealed (paragraph 6).

234. Criminal trials before the Court of Session, in which a European (not being a European British subject) or an American is the accused person, or one of the accused persons, shall be by jury.

9. In the recent debate in the Legislative Council on the 9th March 1883 (I quote from the Supplement to the Gazette of India of April 21st, 1883, pp. 820-821) the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal said, "Ample and exhaustive as was the speech of my honourable and learned friend Mr. Evans, with a great deal of which I sympathized, there are great many facts which I could bring forward to support his contention that there is no administrative difficulty in connection with the matter, and I should have been inclined to challenge more strongly than he did the competency of the Native to try European British subjects. But this is not the occasion on which I shall press those views."

If it be the opinion of the Government of India that this is a case of temporary excitement which will soon die out, I am sure they are mistaken; for I feel that in the whole of my experience in India, this is unmistakeably the strongest and most united and unanimous expression of opinion, and of public discontent that I have ever known, and that the last state will be worse than the first. I could wish for myself that the Bill could be withdrawn, and I do so, not only for myself, but as expressing the opinion of a great many who have spoken to me on the subject, even though they support the principle of the Bill.

10. No one that I am aware of has ever disputed that false and malicious charges are frequently made in the Criminal Courts in India. In Civil cases, the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have in their judgments repeatedly complained of the great want of truth which characterizes much of the evidence which comes before them in the appeals from India. In the course of a judgment delivered in the High Court at Calcutta on the 30th August 1879, Sir Richard Garth, C.J., said: "No evidence here, whether oral or documentary, is, as a rule, so reliable as it is in England." (Sikhhu Chund v. Dulputty Sing, Indian Law Rep. 5. Cal. 387.) And it is only a few years ago that a decision of a District Judge in this Presidency was appealed against to the High Court of Bombay on the ground that the Judge had refused to hear evidence of a custom alleged to exist in a part of Gujarat that women went with child for a period of 2 years and upwards, the question turning upon the illegitimacy of a child born considerably more than 9 months after the father's death. No doubt any amount of evidence would have been forthcoming in proof of the alleged custom.

When in Lucknow a few years ago I was told on very high authority that witnesses could be procured there for a few pice each to prove anything required, from a murder down to the most trumpery assault.

11. Then the presence of a Native Magistrate on the Mofussil Bench will in my opinion act as an encouragement to persons either on their own personal grounds, or instigated and bribed by others to lay false informations against European gentlemen and ladies residing in the district, whilst if the Magistrate were a European, they might, to some extent, hesitate to bring what they knew to be a false and malicious charge against an innocent person.

12. I have myself no practical knowledge of the Mofussil, never having resided in it for any length of time—but I can call in aid the assistance of those who know life in the Districts well, and on this point I cannot, I think, do better than quote a few words used by Sir Stuart Bayley (who is in favour of the Bill) in the debate last month in the Legislative Council at Calcutta: "But there is another aspect of the case of the opposition which I think deserves most attentive consideration, and this is the real danger in which the isolated European, living in the Mofussil, runs from having false cases trumped up against him. It is right that I should state publicly that this danger is a very real and very serious one, for probably no member of this Council has had the same experience as I have of the lives led by planters in the Mofussil. My own experience has given me a strong feeling on this matter, and any one who knows the extreme bitterness with which disputes about land are fought out in the Mofussil and the unscrupulous methods to which recourse is had in conducting these disputes before the Court, methods to which a planter cannot have recourse, will understand how precarious his position may become, and how essential to him it is that the law should be well and wisely administered."

13. I cannot in the least admit that, what some seem to think sufficient, viz., the supervision of the High Court, will be an adequate safeguard to the European planters, managers and ladies scattered throughout the enormously wide districts of British India. Its action, when invoked, will be too late. The real injury will have been caused by the laying of the false information supported by false evidence, and by the hearing in the Magistrate's Court, long before the proceedings are ripe enough for an application to be made to the High Court.

14. In my Minute dated the 5th July 1882, I pointed out what appeared to me to be the fallacy of arguing that because in the Presidency towns Native Magistrates could try and sentence European British subjects, therefore it was practically safe to let them do so in the Mofussil. It has since been concisely said and in better language than my own—"How can Europeans object to Native Magistrates in the Mofussil and yet suffer them in the Presidency towns? The power and influence of the European community, the blaze of publicity, the Bar, the presence and powers of the High Court, are sufficient answers. Besides, the Presidency Magistrate's functions are strictly judicial, and the practice of deliberately attempting to ruin rivals or enemies by cunningly concocted false charges which is still as common as ever in the Mofussil is practically unknown in Calcutta."

15. In conclusion, I may be permitted to remark that in my Minute already referred to, I stated my belief that the limited proposal then placed before my colleagues and myself would "cause a great outcry and discontent among Europeans in India."

That the present Bill has raised a perfect storm of discontent is apparent to all of us. I have already quoted the recent weighty words of the very experienced civilian, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal on that point. And I must say that, although of course regretting, but scarcely wondering at the strong language used by some of the opponents to the present Bill, I am glad to see that this project of legislation which is so unfair and prejudicial to the interests of the European community has met with the almost universal disapproval of my fellow countrymen in India, who, far more than members of the purely official and executive class can better realize the extreme danger to their liberties which this Bill will cause if it becomes law. It has roused race antagonism, which, it should be remembered, must always exist in a more or less degree in this country, as long as England holds it, which of course she always will. The Bill in my opinion can do little, if any, practical good. It has exasperated Europeans throughout the length and breadth of India in the highest degree, is destroying the cordial relations and good feeling which have hitherto existed between Europeans and Natives, and ought in my opinion to be at once withdrawn before any further mischief is done.

16. The modified scheme put forward in the letter from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, dated the 17th April 1883, I strongly object to, as I entertain the decided opinion that no Native should be allowed to have jurisdiction to try European British subjects in the Mofussil.

Minute by the Honourable Mr. JUSTICE WEST on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British Subjects, dated 8th May 1883.

The proposal on which the opinion of the High Court was taken last year was one for placing all members of the Covenanted Civil Service, whether Native or European, on the same footing with respect to their jurisdiction as Magistrates and Judges over Europeans accused of offences. We all supported that proposal with the exception of Mr. Justice Bayley. That learned Judge (now Acting Chief Justice), as his present minute informs us, was from the first strongly opposed to the policy on this subject of the Government of India which, within the proposed limits, his colleagues thought just and wise and logically necessary.

In this division of opinions I cannot forbear from giving expression to my great regret that the Chief Justice who last year gave the policy of the Government of India his unqualified support should not have put on record his views as to the measures now submitted for consideration. It is one of capital importance and one on which his colleagues would have greatly desired to have the guidance of his ability and public spirit. The delay that has occurred has prevented Mr. Justice Kimball, I understand, from recording his opinion, which, from his experience and moderation of character, would have been of great value.

The Bill as it has been framed goes to lengths, I think, for which none of us were prepared, and it has been brought forward in a way which but few of us would think discreet. The "turbulent pride" of my own countrymen and the "sensitive vanity" of Natives, offended by that turbulence on which I dwelt in my few remarks of last June, have both been manifested in a way which shows what important factors these characteristics are in the problem of Indian Government. After what has passed retreat is almost as hazardous as an advance on the part of the Indian Legislature. Angry passions and race antipathies have been stirred up in a way that I have not witnessed since the dreadful days of the Mutiny, and local legislation, however just and beneficent in its purposes and principles, will be carried on with the same risks as electrical experiments in the midst of a thunder cloud.

At the same time I think it impossible that there should now be any yielding of principle. The Government of India cannot afford to be hectorred by any noisy section of its subjects; the lesson would be too soon and too fatally learned by every class in every district that it rules. The matter would, I believe, be best dealt with by withdrawing it altogether from the heated and unwholesome air of Indian politics and making it the subject of an imperial statute. This might readily be cast in a form which, while completely effective, would call forth but little or no opposition. In India it is impossible now, I fear, to frame any Act that will not excite vehement complaints and those venomous recriminations which rankle for a whole generation and make moral union impracticable.

If the matter is to be finally disposed of in India, I must state my conviction that the only safe principles to build on are the reverse of those set forth so vigorously by the Acting Chief Justice. If conspiracies and false accusations are so common as he thinks, if rancorous spite and perjury are so universal and so successful that is a terrible blot on the native character, but a terrible blot also on the British administration of India. Our criminal courts must be the most cruel instruments of injustice that the world has ever seen. We must have failed in our attempts to train native magistrates to conscientiousness and intelligent pride in doing their duty. We ought to acknowledge our failure and close every court not presided over by a European. The native magistrates must be either the tools or the accomplices of the worst of all criminals, and in either capacity can do nothing but mischief.

Now it would be a foolish thing to suppose, as some natives do ignorantly suppose, that the ordinary Englishman has not gained a great advantage over the ordinary Asiatic by the constitutional training which is for him the inheritance of so many centuries. Justice is more in reality a matter of temperament of tradition and training than of mere cleverness. To this extent I think there is a reasonable basis for the desire of Europeans to be tried by their own countrymen rather than by natives of any other country. But they must know well that it is not every Englishman who is fit to be a magistrate or judge nor every Native who is unfit. They are bound to recognise that other people besides themselves have their pride and their prejudices, that universal jealousy would make their own position in this country untenable and that the organization of the tribunals must be regulated by considerations of the general good, not of what would best suit a small section of the community. If they do not recognize all this, their judgment is of little or no value, though, as the object of Government is to make subjects happy, their susceptibilities should still be wounded as little as may be compatible with the general welfare.

It is impossible that India should be permanently attached to England, except by the growth of some community of feeling between the people of the two countries. It is impossible that there should be such a community of feeling without some community of interests and employments. This has been the principle on which native gentlemen have been admitted to the Civil Service. They should be admitted sparingly enough to become imbued with its spirit and traditions. Thus admitted and carefully selected for the higher positions, there is no reason why they should not discharge their duties with credit to themselves and advantage to the public. The honour of our race is concerned in the experiment, and individual Englishmen must make some sacrifices for the sake of proving that they can train a nation.

If there is to be no movement, no participation of power with natives, what must be the result? The English will a generation hence be still more a caste than they are now. With their special advantages it is to be feared they may become an arrogant and unkind caste. Natives even of the highest character must meanwhile sink lower in their own esteem and grow more unfitted for the functions and position that we deny them. It is only by training and trial by selection and association that we can surround ourselves with worthy assistants and colleagues in the work of Government. Are we to put off the work indefinitely because it is attended with some difficulty? Will the difficulty grow less with time? Is not the difficulty very much in ourselves? And has not almost every Englishman who has worked with natives of the higher order found them on the whole sensible and right-minded? Grant that there is some prejudice at present against Europeans, is not this accounted for by a consciousness of not getting altogether fair play from Europeans? It appears to me, I confess, that to enrol natives in the Civil Service and then humiliate them as members of the service would be the surest of all means of spreading discontent amongst the most influential classes and of making moral and political progress impossible.

It is said that the task of trying European offenders exceeds the capacity of a native because of his ignorance "of our manners, customs and habits of thought." But if false and malicious accusations by natives are—as it seems they are—the chief evil to be guarded against, it is surely of more importance that the Magistrate should know the habits of thought of natives than of Europeans, and in this respect a Native Magistrate has a positive advantage. The advantage is not indeed so great as some people suppose. The sharp divisions of caste prevent the higher classes of Hindus from gaining an intimate knowledge of the ways of the lower classes, but still they know on the whole rather more than the European, and they are thus so far better fitted to sift the evidence of unprincipled witnesses. There is a great deal of exaggeration in what is said on this subject, and daily experience shows us that European Judges not knowing even a word of a native language still arrive on native testimony at convictions so strong that they act on them unhesitatingly in condemning native prisoners to death. The real difficulty in practice will arise from the habitual relations of domination and submission between Europeans and Natives. The associations thus created cannot on either side be shaken off at a moment's notice, and any want of strength or balance of character in a Native Magistrate trying an English rough is likely to lead the latter into some insolence or violence of a graver character than the petty offence of which he was first accused. The Native Magistrates who are to try Europeans ought to be as far as possible from peculiarities that would excite contempt or ridicule in the accused, and they should be placed if possible amid more decent and dignified surroundings than are common in the Mofussil.

As to the particular provisions of the Bill I am of opinion that it ought in the first instance to be limited, as the original project was to the object of placing native members of the Covenanted Civil Service on the same footing as their European comrades. When the experiment pushed thus far has proved successful and people have grown familiar with the exercise of the jurisdiction, it can be pushed a step further. It can also be withdrawn if necessary, or the Government may pause until a new stage in general development has been reached.

The European brought before a Native Magistrate should for the present have a right to claim trial by an English Magistrate. The necessity of giving security and of going to jail until they could be taken before a European would make most accused forego their privilege. The statistics could be gathered after a few years and the ground would thus be laid for a safe step in advance.

A European committed to the Sessions Court should in all cases be tried by jury. He thinks much of this mode of trial; Natives do not, but if a general feeling in favour of it should arise, I think there are probably but few districts in which it might not be introduced.

The Sessions Judge should himself preside at all trials of Europeans. They should not be handed over to the Assistant Judges. Section 4 of the Bill should be modified accordingly.

A Native Magistrate enquiring into a charge against a European should have authority to transfer the case at any stage to a European Magistrate. This would get rid of many practical difficulties in the least invidious way.

I think it undesirable that the District Magistrate should be empowered to constitute a special bench for the trial of a European. The exercise of the power would excite jealousy and distrust, and every case of acquittal of a European against the opinion of the Native Magistrate would be paraded as an instance of injustice through race prejudice. The District Magistrate should have power to withdraw or transfer any criminal enquiry whatever (as in fact he has under section 528, Civil Procedure Code) for good cause, and beyond this it is not, I think, desirable to go. The fewer occasions there are for expressed differences of opinion between Magistrates the better.

Articles (b), (c), (d) should, I think, be struck out of section 1 of the Bill. The time will have come for enacting them when article (a) has been proved successful by a few years' working.

Minute by the Honourable MR. JUSTICE SCOTT on the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill dated 13th May 1883.

Had I been asked to express an opinion on this measure six months ago, I should have minuted in its favour without hesitation. But the unofficial class in India is a most important body, and its opinion, when expressed with force and unanimity, as it has been on this matter, deserves careful consideration. I do not, however, find anything in the objections raised sufficient to make me change my mind, although they incline me to invest the proposed change with further guarantees.

It must be remembered that in 1836 the extension to Native Magistrates of jurisdiction over Europeans in civil disputes, and, in a less degree, the abolition of Grand Juries in 1865, raised a similar outcry. Yet even those who denounced them are now ready to admit the beneficial operation of both Acts.

It seems to me that the principle of this Bill is not only a sound one, but has been under discussion for many years, and has been already virtually admitted by the Government of India. It was thus stated by Mr. Ilbert when he introduced the Bill to the Council of India: "In the matter of a limited criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects to substitute for the disqualification arising from race a qualification depending on tried personal fitness."

In 1849 the principle was proposed, but it was thought the time had not come for its adoption. In 1856 and 1870 the Indian Law Commission strongly recommended that all classes should be made equally amenable to the same judiciary. In 1872 the principle again was brought forward and its adoption once more postponed, but only by a majority of one in the Council of India.

Meanwhile the circumstances of the case had changed. The Royal Proclamation of 1858 had announced Her Majesty's gracious will that, "as far as may be, the subjects of whatever race or creed should be impartially admitted to offices in the service of the Crown, the duties of which they might be qualified by their education, ability and integrity duly to discharge."

This was followed by the opening of the doors of the Covenanted Civil Service to such of the Natives of India who passed the requisite examinations.

In 1879 another important step was taken in the same direction. It was decided that a certain number of nominations of young Natives should be made, so as to bring up the number of Indians to the proportion of one-sixth of the whole number.

Thus the Civil Service was thrown open to the Natives of India. It was intended they should go to the Judicial side, and as a matter of fact I believe those that have entered have done so. To this fact must be added that Natives do not go much on leave and do not retire as European officials do. It is obvious that eventually the proportion of Native Judges will be nearer one-third or even one-half than one-sixth of the side of the service they have mainly chosen.

As their numbers increase and Natives have risen to the rank of Sessions Judge and first class Magistrate, it will be obviously impossible to deprive them of the powers attached to these offices. In the first place it would amount to a denial of the advantages of the service they have been invited to enter, and that invitation, instead of allaying discontent, would be a cause of Native irritation.

Then, again, as the number of Native Judges increase, the European judiciary will diminish. European tribunals will become rarer. Thus, unless this change is made, there will be an increasing denial of justice to all native suitors who may have been wronged by European British subjects, and cannot afford the expense and delay of attendance at a distant European tribunal. The increase of the number of European Judges is not possible. Already the cost of the Government of India is as great as its people can bear. The true remedy is to be found in the cautious utilization of the people of the country when they have been trained to the requisite fitness. There is no doubt of their power to reach the requisite fitness. It is sufficient to cite the testimony of the Lord Chancellor given in the debate of the 10th April last, who, in his experience as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, found "the judgment of the Native Judges of India bore most favourable comparison as a general rule with the judgments of the English Judges (of India)."

I now come to the objections that have been raised to the Bill. The first and most common is that race prejudice will influence Native Magistrates unfairly against the accused. The obvious reply is that race prejudice might all along have injured Mahomedans, Parsis, Native Christians and non-British Europeans, and yet no complaint has been heard. But there is another argument to which, I think, not enough weight has been given. Ever since 1836 Native Judges have had no race limit placed on their civil jurisdiction. European British subjects have come within their reach just as any other inhabitant of India. Now, it seems to me that if race antagonism is strong enough to destroy judicial impartiality at all, it would have worked on the Civil as much as on the Criminal side. The temptation is as great to injure a man in his pocket as in his person. Yet I have heard of no case of importance where injustice has been worked in the Civil Courts from this cause.

The next objection is that cases will be trumped up against Europeans and successfully carried through with the collusion of the Native Magistrate. There is no doubt a habit of perjury amongst the classes who appear in the Law Courts of this country. But I have rarely if ever heard of a Civil Native Magistrate being charged with such roguery, and if it has scarcely ever occurred on the Civil side, I do not see why it should happen more frequently on the Criminal side. The instant dismissal which would ensue on detection is, I think, a sufficient safeguard.

Another objection to the Bill lies in the absence of publicity in the Mofussil. This is a sound objection, which, however, must be annually decreasing in force. Since 1872, when the principle of this Bill was only rejected by one vote, railways have doubled in extent, telegrams and letters have doubled in number, and post offices and letter boxes have multiplied from 5,000 to 11,000. The inability of parties to obtain the assistance of Counsel is also urged, but to this objection I do not attach so much weight. The accused who can afford to pay for Counsel can afford to appeal against the decision.

The jurisdiction even of the Sessions Judge is so carefully limited, the power of intervention of the High Court so wide, and appeal so easy, that I do not attach very much weight even to the want of publicity. I think the European British subject will make his voice heard if he ever suffers a serious injustice. Nor have I any expectation that the introduction of this Bill as law will be followed by a host of unfounded charges. I am more afraid that the Native Magistrate may not have the moral strength to treat offending Europeans with due severity if they happen to be persons of local importance.

For this last reason, and in deference to the opinions of the non-official class who are the persons most affected by the proposed Bill, I adopt with a slight modification the proposal of the Government of Bombay to associate for the present a European Judge with the Native Magistrate in cases above a certain importance. But I would make the co-operation of the European Judge a matter of course. I would suggest that for this purpose High Court or Sessions Judges should go on circuit. Such a periodical visit would lend more publicity to Mofussil proceedings. The difficulty of a difference of opinion would arise, but might be solved by summary reference to the High Court.

The special privilege of jury-trial, if accorded to Europeans alone, would, I fear, excite a feeling of inequality, and I prefer the previous plan. Moreover, it would be difficult to find jurymen.

A third plan has been suggested in some quarters, to give the accused the option of being tried by the nearest European Judge or by the resident Native Judge. I think very likely the option would seldom be exercised. But it might be used as a means of expense, would certainly cause delay, and would oust the Native Magistrate from the jurisdiction which, as a Covenanted Civil Servant, he is in principle entitled to possess.

Finally, I think the test of fitness should be rigorously imposed. The Native Magistrate to whom this new jurisdiction is entrusted should as far as possible receive the training of a European Covenanted Civil Servant. Thus would be secured not only the ordinary intellectual qualifications, but the Native of India would also have experienced the civilizing influence of a residence in England. This rule would, no doubt, exclude the new Native Civil Service. But it would be within the principle of personal fitness, which is the avowed basis of the Bill.

No. 766, dated 8th May, 1883.

From—H. N. B. ERSKINE, Esq., Commissioner in Sind,

To—His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., K.C.M.G., and C.I.E., Governor and President in Council, Bombay.

I have the honour to reply to Resolution No. 2258 in the Judicial Department, dated 2nd ultimo, calling for my opinion on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. The Statement of Objects and Reasons shows that the Bill has been prepared because "it was thought anomalous that while Natives of India were admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the Presidency towns." Whether the long established custom that the British in India should be tried only by Judges or Magistrates who are themselves European British Subjects is rightly described as an anomaly is of little consequence, but if it be admitted that it is so, then the long continued existence of such an anomaly surely indicates that its existence has not been permitted without good reason.

3. When writing in June last, regarding the changes proposed, I expressed an opinion that these were not needed, and the discussions that have since that time taken place have only strengthened and confirmed this opinion. Whatever may have been thought when the Bill was first introduced, there can be no question now that the changes it is sought to introduce would be highly unpopular to the European community. The feeling of dislike to being tried by a Native Magistrate may, in a certain sense, be unwarranted, but it is to me at all events a perfectly intelligible one, and I cannot therefore blame those who hold it.

4. The European British subject has hitherto enjoyed certain rights and those he is unwilling to lose. Any member of the Covenanted Civil Service who had become a Judge or a District Magistrate must, it may be presumed, be qualified to try a European British subject so far as mere legal knowledge and requirements go, but this would not in my opinion be reason sufficient for depriving the European British subject of his long enjoyed and highly valued right and privilege. I altogether fail to see that there are any grounds for fearing that the present state of the law is in any way likely to be productive of harm, and therefore whether the present law is anomalous or not I would wish to see it continued.

5. I have never been in a district in which there were not several European Magistrates, and so far as I am aware there are none such. For this reason I do not consider that so far as magisterial cases are concerned, any practical inconvenience is likely to be experienced by the law being maintained in its present form. Some slight inconvenience might be caused were the District Sessions Judge a Native gentleman who could not try a European prisoner, but this slight degree of inconvenience would not, in my opinion, justify the change proposed.

6. I do not consider it necessary to explain in detail why I object to the changes proposed. So much has recently been said and written on the subject that I could state nothing new. I fail altogether to see that the continuance of the present law is continuing an "invidious distinction," for, so far as my experience goes, the distinction occasioned no ill-will, and was thoroughly understood and appreciated by the Native community. It is true that since the Bill has been publicly discussed the cry that the distinction is one that is unjust to the Native community has been raised, but this clearly is merely a result of the agitation caused by the proposed Bill and would never, it may confidently be asserted, have been heard had the Bill not been discussed, and I may add at times attacked with so much virulence by some of the European community. The agitation in favour of the Bill was in no sense spontaneous.

7. There is one other point to which I may refer as an argument against the Bill, namely, that it would not put an end to all distinctions between trials of European British subjects and Natives, and that anomalies would still remain which could only be removed by the repeal of the whole of Chapter 33 of the Criminal Procedure Code,—a course that I do not believe even the supporters of the present Bill would venture to recommend. This being so, matters had much better be left as they are.

No. 921, dated 10th May, 1883.

From—W. H. PROPERT, Esq., Acting Commissioner, Northern Division, Bombay,

To—C. G. W. MACPHERSON, Esq., C.I.E., Under-Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, Bombay.

I have the honour, as directed in Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, Judicial Department, to submit the reports of the District Magistrates in this Division upon the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. The District Magistrates of Kaira and Kolaba have forwarded, in original, separate reports by their Assistants and Deputies, and these also will be found amongst the papers herewith sent.

2. As regards my own opinion I have but little to add to the views I expressed as Collector and Magistrate of Khandesh when the question was mooted last year.

3. I then stated that a few years hence some or all of the changes now proposed by Mr. Ilbert will probably have to be made, but that in my opinion their introduction should be delayed as long as possible. I further stated that, as a rule, Native Magistrates in the Mofussil would rather not have the power to try Europeans, and this opinion I still hold.

4. I should now be glad to see Mr. Ilbert's Bill placed on one side and its further consideration deferred for an unlimited period, as I certainly think that the objections raised to its proposed provisions on the part of the European population of this country are based on solid grounds and are, therefore, worthy of consideration and respect.

5. It would, of course, be unbecoming for me or any other officer to hazard an opinion as to whether the Government of India can, just at this moment, shelve the Bill without loss of dignity. If, however, it be decided to proceed with the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, I would earnestly recommend that the appointment of Justice of the Peace in the Mofussil be conferred only upon members of the Covenanted Civil Service, i.e., those who gained their position by competition in England.

6. It would be easy for every one of us to argue at great length in support of our own particular view of the question, but, as the matter has already been publicly and officially considered from every possible point of view, it is undesirable for individual officers to say more than is absolutely necessary. It may be taken as proved, however, that the general opinion of Europeans of every class, and of a few Natives also,* is opposed to a change in the law.

* e.g., Vide the opinion of the Magistrate, F. C., Mr. Bahmanji Modi of Kaira, herewith sent.

No. P.-775, dated 14th April, 1883.

From—E. P. ROBERTSON, Esq., Commissioner, Central Division, Bombay,
To—C. GONNE, Esq., Chief Secretary to Government of Bombay.

With reference to the Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, I have the honour to state that in my letter No. P.-1345, dated 29th June 1882, I deprecated any change in the existing law as being unnecessary and uncalled for.

2. Viewing the subject by the light of the very grave demonstrations of feeling that have been shown by the European community, it is clear that the opinion already recorded by me was correct. I would now go even further and urge that as there is no necessity for the measure it would be most impolitic to force the change which all experience has proved to be most uncalled for.

3. It cannot be urged that it is called for because the present law is a species of class legislation. Were that an argument to be admitted then all the special privileges that so many members of the Native community enjoy, such as immunity of certain classes from attendance at Civil Courts and the immunity granted to Pardah Nashin women, &c., &c., must in common sense and justice be swept away. Were this done the Natives who enjoy the privileges of so much special class legislation would be the greatest losers.

4. Europeans prize greatly their privilege of being tried by Europeans and by a jury of their countrymen before the High Court. While nothing practical is to be gained by a change in the law much will be lost. The question is not one which affects the Bombay Presidency so much as other places, as in almost every place in this Presidency ready access to European aid and counsel could be obtained. Anyhow the matter must not be dealt with in a sentimental manner. It is all very well to say that the Natives are fit for this and that duty, but they are not fit for all duties, and certainly they are not fit by training and experience to try Europeans. No Government has the right merely for the sake of uniformity and as a mere matter of sentiment to deprive anybody of its subjects of one of their most highly prized privileges; and if no better reason than mere sentiment and a desire to make the law uniform can be brought forward, the sooner all idea of any change in the law is abandoned the better. The proposal to change the law has already done much to undo the good feeling between the Europeans and Natives, and has overturned the labour of love and good feeling which has for the past 50 years actuated our best men. If the measure is pressed forward it will widen the breach between the races and the very first case in which a Native Magistrate deals unwisely and harshly with a European will cause a storm. It is only necessary to imagine a case in which a Native Magistrate should sentence a European to whipping or a case in which a European female should be unjustly sent to a jail or lock-up. The storm which would break over Government would be such as Government could ill bear, while the race antipathy would be so intensified as to defy all future attempts to allay it.

5. As the measure is unnecessary and uncalled for, and as no good can be derived from the change, why not leave good alone and let the law stand as it is.

No. 234 S.P., dated 6th May, 1883.

From—ARTHUR CRAWFORD, Esq., Commissioner, Southern Division, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, Bombay.

I have the honour to state, with reference to the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, that I adhere to the opinion expressed by me on 22nd May last, No. P.-731—4, Confidential.

Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd April 1883.

No. 731P., dated 22nd May, 1882.

From—ARTHUR CRAWFORD, Esq., Commissioner, Southern Division, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, Bombay.

In reply to your letter No. 2985, Conf. of 13th instant, I beg to state that in my opinion it is very desirable to place all the members of the Covenanted Service, whether European or Native, selected by competition, on the same footing with regard to criminal proceedings against European British subjects. As regards those appointed by nomination (Native Civil Service) it will not be invidious, at least for some time to come, to lay down that they shall not try European British subjects, unless they have exercised magisterial powers for three years. A similar restriction has been placed on all Assistant Sessions Judges (vide section 444 of the new Criminal Procedure Code).

Opinion of the Honourable the Advocate General, Bombay, No. 31, dated 28th April 1883.

I do not consider the proposed modifications of the Ilbert Bill mentioned in your letter of the 22nd instant advisable.

I think they will not satisfy either party and will tend to keep alive the present agitation.

They will dissatisfy the Europeans because they abrogate the principle which exempts them from the jurisdiction of Natives in criminal matters and open the door to further concessions, and the Natives will not be satisfied with less than they expected, and will know that by continuous agitation the jurisdiction now given will be extended little by little until at last they are placed (as they consider they ought to be) upon an equal footing with Europeans.

In my opinion it is wisest to settle the matter once for all. Either drop the Bill or go through with it.

No. 560, dated 28th April 1883.

From—J. R. NAYLOR, Esq., Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government of Bombay, Judicial Department.

I have the honour, as desired in Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, to submit my opinion upon the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. On the structure of the Bill I have no remarks to offer. It is designed to "remove from the Code at once and completely every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions," and this object it will no doubt effectually attain, if it becomes law.

3. But in the case of a Bill of this nature it is, I presume, the policy of, and necessity for, the proposed change in the law, rather than the manner of effecting that change, which the Government of India are desirous of obtaining opinions upon. This is a matter upon which I might write at much length, but as a great deal has already been written and said on both sides of the question, and I should only, in giving my own opinion in detail, repeat many of the arguments which have already been very ably stated by other persons, I will confine myself to a few observations which appear to me to strike at the root of the matter.

4. I take it that it has been demonstrated to conviction that the Bill is not required "for the more effectual and impartial administration of justice." The only other grounds upon which its necessity is urged are—

- (1) The removal of the slur upon the character of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, who, when they become District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, are not permitted by the present law to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects; and
- (2) The administrative inconvenience which this disqualification is already beginning to cause and will hereafter cause increasingly, until the full proportion of Native Civilians have been appointed to the service and have risen to the grades of District Magistrate and Sessions Judge.

5. The law, as it at present stands, recognizes the fact that European British subjects object to their being liable to be tried by Native officers, both because they do not give those officers credit for being able to rightly understand and appreciate their motives or the evidence on which they might rely, and also because, as a rule (to which I am glad to be able to admit there are several honourable exceptions), they do not sufficiently trust those officers to believe that they would act impartially towards them. This is a feeling which is not confined to the non-official classes, but is almost universal amongst Europeans. Its existence has been so long recognized by the law that exemption from the jurisdiction of Native officers has come to be regarded by European British subjects as a highly prized privilege, their one safeguard against the intrigue, the deceit and the wily cunning with which they find themselves daily surrounded. The agitation caused by the publication of the Bill under consideration shows how great is the strength of this feeling still, and how averse the classes who will be affected by the change in the law are to part with their privilege.

6. The slur which is impliedly cast by the existing law upon the character of Native Judicial officers is due simply and solely to this intense regard which European British subjects resident in this country have for their own safety against false charges, false evidence and indiscriminating and perhaps partial judges. No Native who knows his own country can say that this feeling is unreasonable, no one with a spark of patriotism in his breast can say that it is unnatural. The question then arises, is it expedient for the sake merely of removing the implied slur upon the character of a few Native Judicial officers to deprive European British subjects of their cherished privilege? I think not. On the contrary, I think that the proposal to do so is unjust,—unjust to the English official classes to whom immunity from false prosecutions is as the breath of their nostrils; unjust to the non-official classes, engaged in trade or other industries, who can only venture to carry on their affairs in the remote parts to which they repair, if they are secure against dishonest and false inventions of Native rivals and cliques; still more unjust to the poorer classes of European British subjects settled or sojourning in different parts of India, themselves the mainstay of our power, or the descendants of the men to whose prowess and self-sacrifice we Englishmen owe the possession of the country to-day and Natives owe the peace, the security and the prosperity which they enjoy under our rule.

7. But it is not merely the wish for the removal of an implied slur which appears to me to be actuating the large number of Natives who are interesting themselves in the passing of this Bill. Every Native fully understands the reason of the law as it now is and marvels, not that European British subjects should cling so closely to this one privilege which they enjoy, but that they should be content with so small an exceptional right. But it is obvious to them that the abolition of this last shred of distinction between themselves and European British subjects will finally bring both races to one common level. The desire to accomplish this end is, I believe, the motive which is really influencing those members of the Native community who are so busy at calling together meetings and memorializing Government in favour of the Bill; for, as has been frequently remarked in the course of the discussions on the measure, the Native community at large has no real interest or concern in the proposed change in the law, the only Natives whom it can affect are the few Native Officers in the Civil Service. If then the Bill be passed, will the political effect of the accomplished degradation of European British subjects be for good or for evil to the Empire? To me it seems that it will be fraught with evil.

8. The administrative inconvenience which it is alleged that the present law causes and will cause increasingly hereafter is, I submit, very much exaggerated. To take our own Presidency—there are at present but two Native Covenanted Civilians, one a Sessions Judge and the other an Assistant Sessions Judge. Mr. Tagore has been a Sessions Judge for some years now. So far as I am aware, not a single case has yet arisen in which his disqualification to try European British subjects has given rise to inconvenience. The railway works to which the Honorable Mr. Gibbs alluded in his speech in the Legislative Council as about to be commenced at Karwar are, I understand, still in the future, and, should they be commenced shortly, there are many other stations in the Presidency to which Mr. Tagore might be appointed—with satisfaction, probably, to himself where there is little or no European population amongst whom criminal cases are likely to rise. Mr. Tagore will not, in the ordinary course, be a Sessions Judge for some years to come. The Native Civilians appointed in this country are as yet only at the bottom of the list. It is clear, therefore, that in this Presidency the present law is not likely to lead to any administrative inconvenience for some years yet.

9. Nor will the administrative inconvenience which it may cause ever be considerable or unavoidable. One-sixth of the Civil Service only will be Natives, even when the rules under the 33 Victoria, Chapter 3, are in full force. At the most, therefore, one-sixth of the Sessions Judges and of the District Magistrates at any given time may be Natives. Surely the Executive Government would have no difficulty in locating this number so as to prevent any such inconvenience as the framers of this Bill wish to obviate. But if this should be found impossible, the difficulty might readily be met by enacting that if the District Magistrate is a Native, the jurisdiction over European British subjects ordinarily exercisable by District Magistrates shall vest in the Sessions Judge and vice versa. It is scarcely probable that the District Magistrate and the Sessions Judge of a district will ever both be Native Civilians, and at any rate such a contingency could always be avoided by the Executive Government.

10. Assuming, however, that the state of the law should occasionally necessitate the transfer of a Magisterial or Sessions case against a European British subject to another district, that would not, after all, be a very great hardship. The very works, which furnished the Honorable Mr. Gibbs with his most forcible illustration of the hardship likely to arise, would in a short time result in establishing railway communication between Kárwár and Dhárwár, and the journey from one place to the other would be no more than the journeys which hundreds of suitors have now to make from the Khaira District to Ahmedabad, from the Broach District to Surat, from the Kolába District to Thana, and from the Sholapur District to Poona. The fact has been quite overlooked that railways and other means of rapid communication are being spread over the length and breadth of the country, simultaneously with the appointment of an increasing number of Native Civilians, and that by the time any serious difficulty is ever likely to occur, the transfer of a case to the adjoining district or the deputation of a special officer to try the case on the spot will be a matter of but very slight inconvenience. But were the probable inconvenience as great as the supporters of the Bill conceive it to be, I would still be of opinion that even that amount of inconvenience is worth submitting to for the sake of maintaining inviolate the right of a European British subject to be tried by none but a European British subject. If it be admitted—as it is on both sides—that for an offence requiring to be punished with more than a year's imprisonment, a European British subject ought to be sent to the High Court for trial, it is surely not extending his privilege unreasonably to say that in order that he may be tried by a fellow-countryman, even for a minor offence, his case shall, when necessary, be transferred to the nearest convenient district.

11. I am, for these and other reasons, of opinion that the proposed change in the Code of Criminal Procedure is quite unnecessary, that it unjustly and needlessly deprives European British subjects of a highly valued privilege which they now enjoy without any injury or injustice to the Natives, and that it will be productive, politically, of evil rather than good effects.

12. But it is possible that in view of the controversy caused by the introduction of the Bill, it may be deemed desirable to pass a measure which without depriving European British subjects altogether of their privilege may yet not disappoint the hopes to which the proposals of the Supreme Government have given occasion in the Native community. Such a measure might be framed in more ways than one.

13. The simplest and, to my mind, the most satisfactory solution would be to extend the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Sessions Judges, as already proposed, but to give every European British subject the right of "appealing unto Cæsar," the right, that is, of claiming to be tried by a European British subject. No doubt, many trivial cases would occur in which an accused person would rather submit to be tried by the Native Magistrate on the spot and at once than incur the delay and trouble involved in a transfer of his case elsewhere. Many instances also would certainly occur, and as years roll on there is reason to hope that their number would increase, in which the character of the Native official would be so well established and so highly respected that his jurisdiction would be voluntarily accepted. But if the right of the accused, being a European British subject, to claim to be tried by a European British subject were reserved, the prospect of being constrained to submit to the jurisdiction of Native officials, which is all that is really objected to by European British subjects, would be removed.

14. It would not be absolutely necessary that in every case in which a European British subject thus claimed his right to be tried by a European British subject the case should be transferred to another district. If it came before a District Magistrate who was a Native, it might be transferred to the Sessions Judge of the same district; if he were a European British subject and vice versa, the law empowering the High Court to give the necessary directions and providing that the powers ordinarily exercisable by the one officer shall be exercised by the other, for the special purposes of any such case.

15. So far as concerns cases which come before a Sessions Judge, it has been suggested to me that there would perhaps be no objection to remove the disqualification of Native Officers, if section 460 of the present Criminal Procedure Code, which provides that—

"in every case triable by jury or with the aid of assessors, in which a European (not being a European British subject) or an American is the accused person, or one of the accused persons, not less than half the number of jurors or assessors shall, if practicable and if such European or American so claims, be Europeans or Americans" were repealed and in its place the provisions of section 234 of Act X of 1872, which directed that every trial of any such person before a Court of Session "shall be by jury" were restored and extended so as to include European British subjects. I have never been able to understand why the law should place Europeans (not being European British subjects) and Americans in a less favourable position than European British subjects. Such a distinction appears to me to be utterly unreasonable and selfish. But whilst I agree that Europeans, whether British subjects or not, and Americans should be placed on the same footing, I do not think that it would be expedient to make trial by jury compulsory in all cases against European British subjects which come before a Sessions Court. The limit of punishment which can be awarded in such cases by a Sessions Court is one year's imprisonment, which shows that the offences to be tried by it are not of so serious a nature as would usually be submitted to a jury. Moreover, the majority of Sessions Judges having no experience in the trial of cases by jury would find the change of procedure difficult to adopt satisfactorily in an occasional and rare case. But the chief argument against the suggestion is, I think, that it would not be acceptable to the opposers of the Bill whose great objection is that the trial should be presided over by a Native officer, for the popular mind attributes great power to the presiding Judge, even in trials by jury.

16. Another and, in my opinion, a better expedient would be to require that whenever a European British subject is arraigned before a Native Officer, he shall be entitled to claim that a Magistrate or Judicial Officer of standing who is a European British subject shall be associated with him on the Bench, and that in the event of a difference of opinion, whether as to law or as to fact, provision should be made for a reference of the point to the High Court for decision. This plan would probably answer well as regards cases coming before Native District Magistrates and would also meet the difficulty in cases triable in Sessions Courts with the aid of assessors, but it would be unsuitable in the few cases triable by jury. This last objection to it might be surmounted by directing that all trials of European British subjects in Sessions Courts shall be with the aid of assessors, and that for them trial by jury shall be confined to the High Court. This would also remove the practical difficulty which is likely to occur in some places of obtaining a sufficient number of Europeans or Americans to form "not less than half the number of jurors," if the accused person claims to be tried by such a mixed jury under section 451 of the Code.

17. I have restricted my remarks and proposals in this report to Native District Magistrates and Native Sessions Judges, because in the debate on the Bill in Council it appears to have been the general opinion that legislation is only necessary for Native Civilians of that standing. In that opinion I entirely concur and would earnestly deprecate the grant of jurisdiction over European British subjects, even in any modified degree or form, to Native officials of lesser standing.

Dated 7th May, 1883.

From—SIR JAMSETJEE JEJEEBHAY, Bart., Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government, Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 2595, dated 18th ultimo.

2. I have ventured to delay my answer, not because I had not made up my mind, but in order to observe and watch the proceedings of the meeting of Saturday last in the Town Hall.

3. I have long felt that the present was a fair case for a just compromise being arrived at whereby the irritation felt by the European community on account of the proposed change in the existing law would be soothed down.

4. That the unjust and impolitic restriction placed by the existing law ought to be removed does not in my humble opinion admit of much doubt. Even among the non-official European community will, I am sure, be found many who will be ready to acknowledge that the disability complained of by the Native community is to them a sore grievance and humiliation, and not a mere fanciful or sentimental hardship.

5. As to section 1 of the Bill I think that all persons holding the office and powers of a Magistrate of the first class should be invested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace. I am humbly of opinion that no invidious distinctions ought to be made between civilian or non-civilian officers.

6. By the removal of the disability against all Magistrates of the first class who are Natives, one grand aim will have been achieved at one stroke. It does not seem expedient that such a vexed question should be again and again mooted. If the disability as regards civilian Magistrates of the first class alone be removed, as the Bill at present purposes to do, the question will sooner or later arise upon what principle the continuance of the disability against officers belonging to the uncovenanted branch of the service is to be justified. When such a question is once more started for public discussion, angry passions will again run high.

7. In my humble opinion much of the irritation will subside if the European British subject, whenever brought up before a Native Magistrate of the first class, were given the privilege of claiming at his option the benefit of another Magistrate of the first class, who should be a European British subject, being associated with such a Native Magistrate on the Bench.

8. As to sections 2, 3 and 4 of the Bill I have no observations to offer.

9. I venture to think that Magistrates of the District and Sessions Judges, whether Native or European, ought to be given the jurisdiction ex-officio over European British subjects, the former by reason of their high and responsible position, and the latter not only because of a similar reason, but also because at Sessions trials they are not sole and independent Judges.

10. In the case of all trials of European British subjects at a mufassal Sessions, I think the accused should at his option be given a trial by jury, of whom at least half should be Europeans. If they prefer a trial by the Sessions Judge with the aid of assessors, I do not see why they should not have their choice, but the privilege of trial by jury ought to be given to them out of respect for their national usages, and this would go far to quiet the minds of the European community, who are so loud in their complaints against a Native Sessions Judge.

Dated 19th April, 1883.

From—The HONOURABLE B. TYABJEE,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your favour No. 2595 of 1883 (Judicial Department), dated the 18th April 1883, requesting my opinion on the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, and to reply thereto as follows.

I have very carefully watched the proceedings in the Supreme Legislative Council in reference to this Bill; I have also read and considered what has been said and written both for and against the Bill at various public meetings and in the newspapers and elsewhere, and I must say that I have formed a very strong opinion both as to the justice and the necessity of the Bill in question.

The principle on which the Bill is founded seems to me perfectly unassailable; the object of legal machinery being simply to secure impartial justice, it ought to have no reference to the race of the Judge, but only to his qualifications. The question ought never to be whether a Judge is a European or a Native, but simply whether he is fit for the exercise of the powers entrusted to him.

The present state of the law is not only anomalous but unsatisfactory. A Magistrate of a lower grade, and therefore presumably less qualified, exercises jurisdiction, because he is a European British subject; while his superior, who is presumably better qualified, is declared incompetent to exercise, because he is a native of this country. It seems to me that this state of the law ought not to be permitted to continue, unless there are overwhelmingly strong reasons for it. The reasons put forward are as follows: (1) That Native Magistrates and Judges are likely to be swayed by their race prejudices in the decision of cases against Europeans; (2) That a great deal of perjury prevails in India and that false charges are often brought against innocent parties; (3) The difficulty of procuring Counsel and the absence of public criticism in the Mofussil; (4) That the Native Magistrates and Judges are not acquainted with the habits and customs of the European community; (5) That a sound State policy requires that the prestige of the ruling race should be kept up and that the subjection of Englishman to the jurisdiction of the Natives of India will diminish this prestige; (6) That no administrative difficulty has arisen and therefore the Bill is premature.

As to the race prejudices, I am in a position to know that no such prejudices exist in the minds of the Native community against Europeans. The Native Magistrates and Judges may possibly be slightly prejudiced in favour of the European accused, they are not likely to be prejudiced against them. We have the experience of the Presidency towns to guide us on this matter on the specific point, and of the whole of India in regard to the administration of justice in general. Native Judges exercise plenary civil jurisdiction in the Mofussil over all classes, including Europeans. They exercise plenary criminal jurisdiction over all the native races of India, but I have never heard it alleged that Hindu, Mussalman or Parsi Judges have been guilty of partiality towards members of their own race or actuated by race prejudices against members of the other native communities. I consider this to be a conclusive answer to the insinuation that they would deal unjustly in the case of Europeans.

As to perjury, false charges, absence of Counsel and public criticism. In the first place these difficulties have been greatly exaggerated, and in the next place they have no special application to Native Magistrates and Judges. These difficulties are more or less incidental to the administration of justice all over India. They apply with precisely the same force to European Judges. They also apply to all other cases, both civil and criminal, in which the natives of India are concerned. The substitution of a European for a Native Magistrate will not affect the question in the least. The European Judge cannot, merely by reason of his race, detect a true charge from a false one. In order to do so he must have natural ability, knowledge of the law and judicial experience. But these are precisely the qualifications which are to be found in Native Judges to whom this Bill applies. Besides, if the Native Judges possess these qualifications sufficiently to try cases of murder and pass sentences of death against the Natives of India, it seems unreasonable to suppose that they are unfit to exercise the small amount of jurisdiction which the Bill confers upon them in regard to European British subjects. The chances are that they would use more care and caution in disposing of a case against an Englishman than ever against their own countryman.

As to want of acquaintance with the habits and customs of the European community. This is not true with regard to Covenanted Civil Servants who have spent years in England, nor with regard to those who have been educated in England or mixed freely with the Europeans in India. Besides this is not a difficulty which deserves very serious consideration. The English Judges, even Judges of the High Court, know next to nothing about the masses of the native community. Many of them do not even understand their language, and yet no one has ever argued that they are unfit to try natives of India by reason of their imperfect knowledge of the native community. Although a special knowledge of the ways of the accused may not, of course, be without its use, it seems to me that what is really essential in the administration of criminal justice is a knowledge of the law and of the world at large, combined with ability to appreciate evidence, in other words the very qualifications which the Bill secures to the European community in a remarkably high degree.

As to prestige of the Ruling Race, I cannot see that it will be in the least impaired by this Bill. The Europeans will still possess the privilege of being tried by specially qualified Judges and Magistrates. All the safeguards as to appeal, &c., are still preserved to them. Further, I think that the real prestige of the ruling race depends much more upon just and generous laws than upon the exception of the Europeans from the ordinary tribunals of justice.

As to administrative inconvenience, I think it is already grave and will become more and more intolerable every year. Further, it is unjust to compel a native of this country to incur the expense of going to a distant tribunal for redress because the Magistrate within reach is incapacitated merely by a race distinction.

On a careful consideration of these circumstances I have come to the unhesitating conclusion that no sound argument has been urged either against the principle or the details of this Bill, but I am convinced that there are strong affirmative reasons in its favour.

I think in the first place that it is highly impolitic to introduce questions of race in the administration of justice. I also think that the present state of the law draws an invidious distinction between European and Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, which ought not to be tolerated. I am also of opinion that trial of European British subjects exclusively by Judges of their own race is calculated to bring discredit on the administration of justice and to produce the impression that the anomaly is maintained, not so much for securing impartial justice, as for screening European offenders.

I do not think the Bill is at all premature. It is impossible to postpone these necessary amendments without serious inconvenience in the administration of justice. The Bill must—if not now—at least in 2, 3, 5, or 10 years hence, pass into law. In the mean time the friction between the races will go on increasing. The Native Covenanted Civil Servants who have attained high judicial posts must feel naturally annoyed at their subordinates enjoying more extensive jurisdiction than themselves. The moral effect of passing the Bill now, when it will be accepted as a measure of justice, cannot fail to be beneficial upon the native populations, whereas passing it 10 years hence will be regarded as nothing more than a concession to irresistible popular agitation.

I am convinced that the stability of the British Empire depends far more upon just and equal laws and upon a generous treatment of the people than upon anything else ; and I am respectfully of opinion that this Bill is nothing more than the necessary outcome of the enlightened policy pursued by the British Government for the last 50 years, and that it will materially assist in promoting feelings of loyalty and attaching the people to the Throne.

But if the introduction of the Bill was in the first instance wise and politic, as I think it undoubtedly was, the passing of it now has become a matter of absolute political necessity. The moral effect upon the native populations of shelving or withdrawing the Bill, under the present circumstances, cannot fail to be pernicious. Such an act will be looked upon by them as a surrender of right and reason to passion and prejudice, as a triumph of turbulent agitation—however wrong—over calm and respectful representations, however just and well founded. It is impossible not to see the danger of such an idea taking hold of the minds of the 250 millions of the natives of this country.

I would therefore humbly, but strongly, advise the Government to pass this Bill into law, not only on account of its own intrinsic merits, but also on account of the exigencies of the situation.

Dated 4th May, 1883.

From—The HON'BLE BADRUDIN TYABJI, High Court, Bombay,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I regret that I have not been able to reply to your letters of the 23rd and 25th April fully before to-day. I have, however, been so busy during the last few days that I have scarcely had time to look about me.

I may say at once that I fully appreciate the difficulty in which the Government is placed, and I heartily sympathise with the object which the Bombay Government seems to have in view, viz., to bring about a settlement of this vexed question in a manner not only equitable in itself, but with due regard to the feelings of the important communities concerned on each side.

In attempting a compromise two points must be carefully borne in mind: 1st, the necessity of removing all invidious distinctions between European and Native Magistrates and Judges of the same position as far as practicable, and 2ndly, the removal of all exceptional provisions calculated to produce the impression—rightly or wrongly—that Europeans are to have, to use Macaulay's words, "something more or something less than justice," or even justice of a kind different from that meted out to the Natives of India. Bearing these two points in mind I have satisfied myself that the proposals mentioned by you may be accepted as a reasonable compromise by both parties to the controversy.

So far as Sessions Judges and District Magistrates are concerned, your proposals are the same as those in Mr. Ilbert's Bill, and it would be impossible to interfere with them in the slightest degree without trenching upon the principle of the Bill. As I understand, however, the difference between Mr. Ilbert's Bill and your proposals is this—that whereas the former would merely authorise the Government to appoint first class Magistrates who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service or of the Native Civil Service or Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates to be Justices of the Peace, you would make all first class Magistrates to be ex-officio Justices of the Peace just like the Sessions Judges and District Magistrates, with this proviso that under special circumstances the District Magistrate may associate a European Magistrate to sit with the Native Magistrate. After the best consideration I can give to the subject I think your proposal is an improvement on Mr. Ilbert's Bill, both from the European as well as the Native point of view. It ought to satisfy the Native community because it will not only remove the mark of inferiority from Native Magistrates, but also all grounds for even suspicion as to partiality, and it ought to satisfy the Europeans because they will be comforted by the presence of a member of their own community on the bench.

I do not think there is any danger of the Natives clamouring for the bench system in addition to the provisions in Mr. Ilbert's Bill.

As regards the jury, I see no objection to it if the option is given to all prisoners tried before the Sessions Court. The uniformity of a system of laws is highly desirable, and no exceptional provisions in favour of a particular race ought to be made, if it can possibly be avoided. Your suggestion on this point seems to me to be perfectly harmless, and if you think it would conciliate the European community, I for one would gladly accept it.

With reference to the general principle of the Bill I have already stated my views both to the Government—in the Press—and at the public meeting. You say that I have not dealt with the strongest of all objections, viz., "the absolute unwillingness of Europeans to be tried by persons not of their own race as shown by them in whatever part of the globe they have settled,—Turkey, Egypt, China, Japan, &c." Now with all deference this unwillingness to be tried by Turkish, Egyptian, Chinese and Japanese Magistrates is founded not upon the difference of race but upon the proved incapacity or corruption of the judicial officers in those countries. Race has nothing to do with it. It is the quality of justice administered in those countries that has compelled Her Majesty's Government to secure special treaty rights not merely for British-born subjects, but ALL subjects of Her Majesty, whether natives of India or of England. Moreover there is nothing to prevent the Consular Courts from being presided over by Asiatic subjects of Her Majesty, provided they are fit for the post. If the objection had been founded on mere difference of race, and not of qualifications, you would have expected similar arrangements in France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, &c., all of which countries are peopled by races different from the English. Further, look at Ceylon—the Native Magistrates there exercise jurisdiction over Europeans, no less than over Natives. Again, I understand that in the French and Portuguese territories in India, no such distinction is recognized.

Although, therefore, I can understand and appreciate the feelings of the European community on this point, I cannot see any just or valid foundation for them.

Dated 23rd April, 1883.

From—JOHN FLEMING, Esq.,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your No. 2595 of the 18th instant, in which you inform me that the Governor in Council will be glad to have my opinion on the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

In reply I beg to state that I entirely approve of the decision of Government “to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based on merely race distinction.”

That there is no immediate necessity for the change is in a sense true, but I cannot agree with those who regard the present disability of Native Magistrates as a mere sentimental grievance unworthy of serious attention.

To withhold from the Native Members of the Civil Service powers granted to Europeans is to maintain an invidious and to the former a humiliating distinction, calculated to lower their self-respect, and to rouse the indignation and resentment of the educated classes throughout the country; and I am therefore of opinion that Government has acted wisely in bringing forward this measure voluntarily, and anticipating an agitation, which is certain to come, if it be withheld.

With regard to the opposition which is being offered to the Bill, it is no doubt matter of serious concern that almost the whole non-official European community has been arrayed against it; but I respectfully submit that unless better reasons be advanced than any yet offered to the public, the removal of judicial disqualification based on race distinction should not be delayed.

The ascendancy of Englishmen in India will not be maintained by their hedging themselves round with privileges; and when men talk of their rights as members of the conquering race, they forget that every forward step in the British advance in India has been made with the aid of Native allies, and that our position in the country is largely dependant upon the good-will of the people.

It is natural that a man should prefer to be tried by one of his own race and speech, but it is simply absurd that a European should regard it as an indignity to be placed under the jurisdiction of a Native Member of the Civil Service.

As regards the fears expressed by the opponents of the Bill, that Native Judges are likely to favour their countrymen, and that false charges will be encouraged, they seem to me exaggerated and to a large extent without any tangible foundation.

It may be admitted as probable that the common people will more readily bring charges against Europeans (be they true or false) before a Native than a European Judge; but what justification is there for presupposing that the one will deal less impartially with such cases than the other?

The conduct of the Native Magistrates in the Presidency cities has not been impugned, and the suggestion that they would act differently if placed in some remote place in the interior and not subjected to the constant light of public opinion is a mere assumption.

For my own part, a long and intimate friendly intercourse with educated men in this country leads me to believe that the natives will do no discredit to the Service to which they have been admitted.

They are proud of the position they have attained, and will strive to justify their title to it as acting up to the noble traditions of the Service.

Since the beginning of this year I have been twice in the North-West and the Punjab, once before and once after the promulgation of this Bill, and on both occasions I saw a good deal of non-official Europeans and Eurasians; and I am satisfied from what I heard that the hostility to the Bill has been excited, not so much by the Bill itself as by the previous action of Government with respect to appointments of men of European race to the Uncovenanted Service and to the Public Works Department.

Intense indignation is not unjustly felt, at the declared preference of so-called natives over men of European origin, born and reared in the country, and I respectfully urge that Government should at once cancel all orders basing disqualification for employment on race distinctions.

I submit that the Government should recognise fitness only in making its appointments, engaging the best men it can get, irrespective of race and creed. At the same time I can see no reasonable objection to a preference being given, other things being equal, to a Native over a European, meaning by the former a man born and brought up in the country whether of pure European or mixed blood or not, and by the latter, a man who has come from beyond seas.

I omitted to say above that I consider a European has a right to expect that those who have jurisdiction over him should thoroughly understand his language.

In the case of Native Members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service, this is guaranteed by the severe examination they have successfully passed; but in the case of the Native Civil Service it is probable that men will be sometimes appointed whose knowledge of English is imperfect, and from such jurisdiction over Europeans should be withheld.

Dated 23rd April 1883.

From—RAGHUNATH NARAYEN KHOTE,

To—The Chief Secretary to Government of Bombay.

With reference to your letter No. 2595 of 18th instant, asking for my opinion on the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I have the honour to submit the following for the information of His Excellency in Council, as my humble view of the subject which His Excellency in Council has been pleased to refer for my opinion.

2. This amendment is but the natural outcome of the wise and benign policy of the British Government as proclaimed from time to time to Her Majesty's subjects in India. Time was when education had scarcely made any progress among the people of this country; when peculiar criminal laws had to be locally administered in different parts of the country quite unsuited to the usages and traditions of European British subjects; and when perhaps for the consolidation of the power and the preservation of the prestige of the British rule in the peculiar circumstances of a newly-subjugated and half-civilized country, a partial exemption in favour of Europeans from the ordinary local tribunals, and especially those presided over by natives, and the provision of exclusive criminal tribunals and an exclusive criminal procedure were necessary. But the conditions have now completely changed,—education has spread, and is spreading far and wide; a century and more has rolled over the conquered country; the consolidation of the Empire has been accomplished and its stability placed upon a permanent basis; a uniform Penal Code and law of procedure (with some exceptions only as to the law of procedure in the three Presidency Towns) have been promulgated throughout the length and breadth of the country; the removal of all distinctions of caste, colour or creed has been repeatedly proclaimed in statutes issuing from the Imperial Parliaments, and in Royal Proclamations issuing from the Throne. And the time has long since come when all distinctions between the trial of Europeans and of Natives ought to be altogether abolished.

3. Any distinctions favouring one class of subjects over another, in the present progressive state of the country, deeply wound the growing intelligence of the people, who plainly perceive and keenly feel such distinctions as so many violations of the plighted faith of the British Nation. Such distinctions are obviously mischievous, for they alienate the affections of the people, and are in direct opposition to the noble principle and policy of the British Government, i.e., to rule India not by mere force, but through the affections of the people.

4. I am aware, on the other hand, that distinctions in favour of European British subjects have long existed and must needs be cherished by them as their vested birthright. It would convulse those who have hitherto enjoyed these to withdraw them altogether and at one stroke. This must be effected gradually as time and opportunity may favour the enforcement of the declared principle and policy of the British rule.

5. But the proposed amendment is indeed only a comparatively small advance in this direction. It only contemplates the placing of certain trusted and experienced Native Officers of Government in the exercise of the judicial office upon an equal footing with Europeans, and no more—but not the subjection of the British-born European indiscriminately to all the ordinary tribunals of the country which administer Criminal Justice to the people at large, nor to assimilate the peculiar procedure devised in his behalf to the ordinary procedure adopted far and wide in respect of the entire people. The proposed amendment is thus in itself a step of no large import, but is important in so far as it recognizes and carries out, even though it be to a limited extent, the grand principle of Government which underlies all administration in this country.

6. The opposition made by non-official European classes is to a great extent the result of short-sightedness and class prejudice, and especially of false notions of pride of race and superiority over Natives of this country.

7. The Europeans, who are thus opposing the measure, if they merely divest themselves of the notions which now cloud their judgment, will at once admit that under Native Officials they are likely to receive, if possible, more consideration than even under European Officials; for the former will naturally be careful to bear in mind, when trying European offenders, that their actions will be vigilantly watched in every direction, and they would rather err in leaning towards, than in being arrayed against, the European offender. All the fears entertained by those who oppose the Bill are more imaginary than real.

8. It is a matter well worthy of note that while Europeans profess the extremest aversion to being tried by natives in theory, in practice they frequently seek trial at the hands of Natives rather than of European Judges. On the 18th of this month prisoner Dwyer, a European soldier, was charged with the murder of a native up-country, and was put on his trial at the Criminal Sessions at the High Court just closed. He was alleged to be insane, but the European Counsel who defended him used his best endeavours to secure a Native Jury. He not only did not avail himself of the privilege which his client possessed of claiming a Jury, the majority of whom should be Europeans, but actually challenged no less than eight European Jurors, and he might have succeeded in getting an entirely Native Jury, had the law permitted his challenging more than eight Jurors without assigning reasons. I might quote as well another recent instance in which all the European offenders in a certain case at Allahabad preferred being tried by a Native Judge to being tried by a European.

9. The only inference that can be drawn from these and other similar instances is, that frequently European offenders do not in practice object to their trial before a Native Magistrate, although in theory, under false notions of superiority and pride of race, they may insist upon their right to be tried by Judges of their own nationality.

10. The oppositionists, too, have not even shrunk from using the argument against this Bill, that although highly educated, the natives do not possess that rectitude of character which is necessary for the impartial administration of justice. This assertion it is hardly necessary to combat, but if the Bill be now abandoned in consequence of their clamour on this ground, it would be inflicting undeserved degradation on the natives and attaching to them a cruel stigma, for they would thereby practically be proclaimed to the world as wanting in uprightness and moral character.

11. In conclusion, therefore, I beg leave to state that in my opinion the righteous and impartial policy of Her Majesty's Government towards India cannot be perfected so long as the oft-given generous promises of equal administration without distinction of caste, creed or colour is not carried out in its integrity. The present proposal, therefore, to place trusted and experienced Native Officials on a par with their European brethren in the Service, so far as their powers relate to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, is a step tending in the right direction; and is not only in perfect unison with the generous and righteous policy England maintains in the government of India, but is imperatively demanded by that policy.

Dated 26th April, 1883.

From—MR. RAGHUNATH NARAIN KHOTE, Bombay,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I received yesterday your demi-official of the 23rd instant. I have already submitted my views on Mr. Ilbert's Bill generally in answer to the official reference which His Excellency was pleased to make to me. I had then scarcely any conception of the modified proposals, which were under the consideration of Government, and which are set out in yours under reply.

I have given to these proposals my best consideration, and taken as a whole I believe they are eminently calculated to suit the present exigency. My firm belief is that the scheme you have defined will soothe the irritation of the European population, while it will remove the evil complained of by the Natives. I take leave to deal with each proposal in order:—

- (1).—District Magistrates, Native or European, doubtless must be given the jurisdiction ex-officio, but we all know that in practice they will have few or no opportunities of exercising it. They will enjoy the jurisdiction more as a compliment to their responsible position than from any actual need for the exercise of it, except in very rare cases. My impression is that in practice they now exercise original jurisdiction in exceptional cases only.
- (2) & (3).—All Sessions Judges, whether Native or European, ought, I think, to have the jurisdiction ex-officio, but it would be to my mind desirable to make it imperative that they should be aided in such cases by a jury, of whom at least half should be Europeans. The same rule should apply to Assistant Sessions Judges. A trial with the aid of assessors would not, I think, give complete satisfaction. A trial by jury so constituted would have an almost magical effect on the European mind. I am persuaded that the opportunity might be taken to enlarge somewhat the limit of sentence, which it is competent to Sessions Courts to pass upon European culprits. The present limit of one year appears to me to be ridiculously low.
- (4).—The Bench system as regards Magistrates of the first class would become a valuable amendment to Mr. Ilbert's Bill. It would satisfy all parties, and would have the additional advantage of removing the invidious distinction between civilian and non-civilian Magistrates of the first class. It would give greater confidence in the tribunal, when both concurred in the verdict or sentence, and the provision for a reference to the High Court in case of difference of opinion would remove all room for complaint. There would, I take it, be the remedy by appeal in case of conviction as at present.

Thus altogether the scheme appears to me an extremely satisfactory one, and I venture to hope that it will eventually find its way in the shape of amendment into Mr. Ilbert's Bill.

I am going to take advantage of the opportunity I have offered to me in conveying the meeting next Saturday to set forth the outline of the scheme for the consideration of the speakers, and I will avail myself of the liberty held out to me to say that I have reason to believe such a scheme is at present under the consideration of Government. I will take care to indicate that nothing is known as to what conclusions Government may eventually arrive at.

I will also take the liberty of using the considerations, which you have given me as your own personal views. I agree with them in toto; and in putting them forward I fear I shall be using your own language for the simple reason that in conveying the same thoughts I cannot find any better of my own.

I saw Mr. Badrudin this afternoon, but he had no time, so we shall meet tomorrow again to compare notes.

Dated 24th April 1883.

From—MAHADEV WASUDEV BARVE,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Judicial Department.

With reference to your letter No. 2595, dated 18th instant, I have the honour to append a brief statement of my views on the "Native Jurisdiction Bill," a copy of which was enclosed in the letter under reply.

I cannot help thanking His Excellency in Council for giving me an opportunity of expressing my sentiments on the important Bill which has attracted so much public attention.

Notes on the Honourable Mr. Ilbert's "Native Jurisdiction Bill" by Mahadev Wasudev Barve, dated 24th April 1883.

The Bill has originated in a desire to remove certain legal disabilities under which the Native members of the Civil Service are placed in the matter of trying European British-born subjects. Its object is to place all the classes of Her Majesty's subjects in this country on a footing of equality in the eyes of law. The old law of Europe seems to have recognised distinctions between the followers of different religions, and the restrictions in the Indian law, now proposed to be dispensed with, are evidently a reminiscence of that law. In the early days of the British rule in this country these protective restrictions were excusable and, indeed, desirable, owing to, among other causes, the ignorance of Natives to understand the spirit of the English law which is so remarkable for its tender regard for the liberty and honour of an individual. Circumstances, however, have now vastly changed. The spread of English education among the Natives has raised their status, and they are found qualified for admission to the ranks of the Civil Service. Several of them, when invested with powers like those now proposed to be conferred upon them, have exhibited on the Bench moral rectitude in no way inferior to that of their English compeers. Indeed, I am not aware of any instance in which a Native has abused these powers to the prejudice of any European subject. Surely, such a case, if any, would have been pointed out and commented upon. The whole animated controversy which the Bill has given rise to, is at least singularly silent as to any instances of abuse of this sort.

But the desire to make the necessary amendments in the present law appears to have been prompted, not only by the improved tone observable in the official ability and rectitude of Natives, but by certain administrative difficulties which threaten to make legal proceedings in cases (for which the present Bill is intended to make a satisfactory provision) clumsy and circuitous, not to say that it would be inconvenient to the public and unnecessarily humiliating to the "pick and cream" of the Native Civil Service. The exclusion of Natives from the exercise of powers which are conferred upon European members of the Civil Service, of their own and sometimes of inferior standing, must have been a source of incessant uneasiness to them. These powers, considered by themselves, are not among the cherished objects of the ambition of any thoughtful Native in this country; but, when viewed in connection with other privileges which are liberally bestowed upon them, they have naturally become covetable objects, not for their own sake, but because exclusion from them is looked upon as a badge of inferiority.

If the amendments of the present Bill had been proposed about a year ago, when the whole Criminal Procedure Code was revised, they would probably have not evoked anything like the present violent and ungraceful opposition. Those who have studied carefully the history of English legislation in this country, which has always been animated with a desire to make the law progressive and equitable, by curtailing provisions which savour of race prejudices and distinctions, have acquired such a confidence in the instinctive uprightness of British statesmanship that they do not feel any hesitation in saying that sooner or later the reform intended to be introduced by the present Bill will be carried out. But if on the present occasion the Bill were allowed to drop, simply for the interested opposition of a very small section of the community, it would show on the part of Government a painful disregard to the feelings of the people of this country, the more so especially as the opponents of the Bill have not been able to show any reason for giving it up, except its being unnecessary and impolitic. But the necessity of the measure, as mentioned above, has been practically felt; and as to the complaint that the measure is impolitic, it may be more correctly said that the withholding of the said powers from Natives would be still more impolitic.

I am humbly of opinion that the time for extending the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates has arrived, and that as the powers under the amended law would be conferred only on such Native members of the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Service as would show themselves deserving of them by several years' service of approved integrity and ability, the danger which it is alleged would result to the people of the class over whom the jurisdiction would be exercised, is simply imaginary and unfounded.

Dated 28th April 1883.

From—MR. PESTANJI JAHANGHIL,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government, Political and Judicial Departments, Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter No. 2595 of the 18th instant, in which you desire me, by the direction of His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor, to submit my opinion on the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. As the law at present stands, the exercise of criminal jurisdiction over what are called "European British subjects," outside the Presidency towns, is limited to Judicial Officers who themselves are European British subjects. In other words, those servants of the Crown in India who do not fall within the definition of "European British subjects" and who are chiefly Natives of the country are, though they are appointed to high posts and are deemed competent to discharge high judicial and administrative functions, declared incompetent by law to exercise criminal jurisdiction even of a very limited character over European British subjects outside the Presidency towns.

3. This disability arising out of race distinction is not only considered as opposed to the fundamental principle underlying the administration of the British Government in India, but is also felt as the source from which increasing administrative inconvenience will spring.

4. The Bill now before the Legislature proposes to do away with this artificial disability created by law, and to place the exercise of criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects on a basis which will be differentiated not as heretofore by distinction of race, but by distinction between the two great branches of the Civil Service, viz., the Covenanted and Uncovenanted, the former including what is known as the statutory Native Civil Service. Assistant Commissioners in non-regulation provinces and Cantonment Magistrates are also proposed to be included in the category.

5. Further, though the disqualification arising from race is sought to be removed, the conferring of the powers necessary for the exercise of criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects is proposed, except in the case of Session Judges and District Magistrates who are to be Justices of the Peace ex-officio, to be permissive. It is left to the discretion of the Executive Governments to appoint to the office of the Justice of the Peace only such of the persons belonging to the classes named, as they may think fit.

6. This Bill, so far as it relates to the proposal of giving powers to Native Magistrates and Judges, has met with fierce opposition, chiefly from the non-official European community of India.

7. The Bill is opposed on the ground that under its provisions the personal liberty of European British subjects incurs grave risk of being jeopardised, and that European enterprise and capital of which India stands in so much need will be scared away from the country by such a feeling of insecurity.

8. The reasons assigned for this apprehension generally are, (1) incapacity of Native Magistrates and Judges to understand European manners and customs and ways of thought, (2) liability of Native Magistrates and Judges to be swayed by race prejudices, (3) prevalence of perjury and existence of a custom to get up false charges against innocent persons in India, and (4) absence of publicity and public opinion and of proper legal assistances in the mofussal.

9. These arguments and others of a more or less similar nature have been urged on the one hand and answered on the other with force and ability both in and out of Council, and in India and England generally. In fact, all that can be said on both sides of the question has been said; and I do not think there is now any new light to be thrown on the discussion of the subject.

10. I shall not therefore weary His Excellency the Governor with a repetition of what has already been said and said so well, but content myself with respectfully expressing my opinion in a general way that there is little or no real force in any of the arguments advanced against the Bill as above stated; and that the apprehensions entertained as to the insecurity in which the lives and liberties of European British subjects will be placed by the proposed measure and as to all the evil consequences arising therefrom, are groundless.

11. The existing legal safeguards in favour of European British subjects, the education and the moral surroundings of the Native Officials on whom the choice of powers will fall; the trial of mental and moral qualifications they will have undergone before being invested with powers; their skill in detecting frauds and falsehoods acquired from a course of previous judicial training and from their more intimate knowledge of Native habits and thoughts; a vigilant supervision on the part of Government; a jealous watchfulness on the part of the European community generally; the knowledge on the part of the Native Judges and Magistrates that they are watched and are on their trial; the network of railways and electric wires all over the country which have annihilated all difficulties of time and space; the growth of an intelligent public opinion even amongst the Natives of the mofussal,—all these militate against the supposition of anything likely to go wrong in the way apprehended.

12. Similar fears were expressed and evils predicted when the so-called Black Act was passed in 1836; but time has proved them to be all groundless.

13. It is said that in Her Majesty's possession of Ceylon the Natives of the place exercise criminal jurisdiction over Europeans. If so, we have not heard of any evils arising out of such exercise of jurisdiction; and there is not a small influx of European enterprise and capital in Ceylon.

14. Other non-Asiatic nationalities such as Americans, French, Germans, Italians, &c., though they are generally akin to European British subjects in religion, habit and thought, and are not distinguishable from them in the eyes of the Natives of India, are not exempted from the jurisdiction, civil or criminal, of Native Judges and Magistrates; and it is not shown that they have suffered any inconvenience or hardship from the operation of such jurisdiction over them. And it appears somewhat inconsistent that the opponents of the Bill, while they evince so much anxiety for the safety of European British subjects, should not extend a tithe of their solicitude for the protection of other classes of Europeans and Americans, who have so many ties of affinities with them and who will equally be the objects of persecution or victims of incapacity at the hands of Native Magistrates and Judges.

15. But it appears that the opposition to the measure proposed arises not so much from a rational conviction of any serious dangers apprehended from its operation as from a sentiment that it would be infra dig and loss of prestige for the people of the ruling race to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Judges. It is also just possible that the classes from which European criminals are drawn have a lurking fear that if the present Bill were to become law, justice will overtake them more speedily than under the present system which is productive of delay and inconvenience to all parties concerned.

16. The feeling of race superiority is a natural feeling and cannot be altogether ignored; and it must also be admitted that the preservation of English prestige is desirable from many points of view. But the English are eminently a practical and just people; and I have no doubt that when passions are subsided and when they come to learn by experience that a certain class of Her Majesty's servants who have been invested with certain powers have proved themselves worthy of exercising those powers, and that no harm has come out of the exercise of those powers, they will not be slow to extend the right hand of fellowship to their Native brethren. They will not be slow to recognize the change time has wrought, and to declare that it is alike unfair and inconsistent with the just principles of their own Government that a class of Crown Servants, otherwise qualified in every respect, should simply from the accident of their nationality, be under a perpetual ban of ignominy which is subversive of self-respect and a high moral tone.

17. I remember the time when there was a strong prejudice against Natives being made solicitors and barristers; and I also remember the days when it was considered simply blasphemous for a European to place himself under Native medical treatment. But I have seen these prejudices wearing off in my own lifetime. Now Native solicitors and barristers stand shoulder to shoulder and work side by side with their European brethren in the dispensation of Her Majesty's justice. European solicitors send briefs to Native barristers and vice versa. European solicitors and barristers plead before Native Judges. Native Surgeons don Her Majesty's uniform, and not only European gentlemen but also their families avail themselves of Native medical aid.

18. In the same way I feel sure that the honest English instinct will assert its ascendancy, and the prejudice against Europeans appearing for their trial before Native Magistrates and Judges will wear out in course of time; and perhaps after some years it will be wondered why so much enthusiasm, which might have been reserved for a better cause, was exhausted upon this little Bill.

19. In these circumstances, I humbly think that Government, in order to show every due deference to the feelings and sentiments of the large and important European community of India—important both to Government and the people of the country—should, for the present, introduce the measure in such a tentative form as the gradual working of it will in time disarm it of its fears and suspicions, and convince it that Government, while remaining loyal to the fundamental principles of the British rule in India, and while bound to remove all administrative inconvenience, will take no step which is not called by a change in time and circumstances. With this view, I would respectfully propose that powers to try European British subjects outside the Presidency towns in the limited way authorized by law should, for the present, as far as Natives are concerned, be conferred only on those Native servants who have entered or may hereafter enter the Covenanted Civil Service by open competition in England. The high test of proficiency they pass, their residence in the midst of Englishmen in England for a number of years, and their observation of English manners and customs and ways of thought will and ought to be a guarantee that they will properly discharge the functions entrusted to them. When this arrangement is found to work satisfactorily, as I have no doubt it will be,

and when further administrative inconvenience is felt, the process of giving powers to Natives may be carried further without, it is hoped, much opposition on the part of the European community of India.

20. This brings me to the consideration of what is called the "thin-end-of-the-wedge" argument. It appears to me that the fears, or I would rather say the anticipations, of the European community on this point are not unfounded. The present Government can speak only for itself. It cannot bind its successors. And it is impossible in the nature of things that in the varying vicissitudes of human affairs a kind of compact can be made and maintained for ever against any change whatever in some particular respect. An enlightened and progressive administration, whose motto is equality of status before the law, cannot look with complacency or indifference upon such personal laws or class privileges as may be found to hamper the good government of the country. All that the Government can say will be that it will make no change lightly, make no change which will not be called by the necessities of the administration.

21. The conclusions then at which I have arrived and which I have ventured to submit above with all respect and deference are—

1. That the principle of the Bill is perfectly sound and is in consonance with that lofty standard which the British nation has in its enlightened wisdom adopted in the Government of India.
2. That there are no grounds for apprehending any evil consequences from this measure to the lives and liberties of European British subjects or to the material development of India.
3. That the opposition to the measure has arisen more from a sentiment that it will be derogatory to the prestige of European British subjects to submit themselves for trial to Native Magistrates and Judges than from any other cause.
4. That this feeling on the part of a large and important community is, in present circumstances, entitled to all reasonable respect.
5. That this feeling will be temporary and will disappear as similar feelings in connection with other questions have disappeared under a calmer and juster appreciation of things.
6. That when Englishmen in India come to know by actual experience that the powers conferred upon a certain class of Native servants have been wisely used and that no mischief has arisen from the exercise of those powers, their natural instinct of justice and fair play will not recoil from recognizing the fact and admitting that it is, for the sake of a sentiment, as unfair to Government that their administrative work should be obstructed as to a deserving class of Her Majesty's servants that they should be branded with an everlasting stigma of infamy.
7. That to bring Englishmen in this frame of mind, it is desirable and expedient to proceed tentatively.
8. That with this object in view the desired powers may for the present be conferred on those Native Officers who have entered or may hereafter enter the ranks of the Covenanted Civil Service by open competition in England.
9. That when this arrangement is found to work satisfactorily, as no doubt it will be, the fears and suspicions now entertained will, to a great extent, be removed, and the system may be extended further as only administrative necessities may dictate.

22. Before concluding, I would refer to one point more, and I refer to it not as an objection or suggestion from me but as a point which is not clear to me. Under the Bill in question 4 classes of officers are eligible for the office of the Justice of the Peace:—(1) members of the Covenanted Civil Service, (2) members of the statutory Native Civil Service, (3) Assistant Commissioners in non-regulation provinces, and (4) Cantonment Magistrates. Section 7 of the Bill provides that "nothing in this Act shall affect the validity of any appointment made before the passing of this Act." Thus the powers as Justices of the Peace of European Military and other officers who may now be in the positions of Commissioners, Political Agents, Session Judges, District Collectors, &c., will not be affected; but such officers appointed after the passing of the Act will not be eligible for the office of Justice of the Peace. Unless, therefore, it be intended that all such officers, whether in regulation or non-regulation provinces, will in future be filled by members of the Civil Service only, it would appear that the Legislature, while trying to curtail the area of administrative inconvenience on the one hand, is, on the other, extending it, by placing a large class of servants of rank and position beyond the pole of jurisdictional powers.

Dated 26th April 1883.

From—K. T. TELANG, Esq., High Court, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government, Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 2595 of 1883, Judicial Department, dated the 18th instant, requesting me to furnish Government with my opinion on the Bill for amending the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, now before the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Viceroy. And in reply to that letter, I beg to state my opinion as follows.

Dealing with the question raised by the Bill, first as one of principle only, I own that I cannot see any possible ground on which its main object can be assailed. That object is not only in complete consonance with the principles which have been laid down as the guiding principles of British administrative policy in this country during the past half century; it is also in consonance with the lessons which all the past history of the world teaches us. The more earnest and thorough-going the attempts made to weld into one corporate body with co-equal rights and privileges any two races standing in the position of governors and governed, the greater the stability of the Government, and the greater the permanent happiness of all classes of the population. This seems to me to be so manifest, and is, indeed, so far conceded by the opponents of the Bill in question, that it is quite unnecessary to labour that point any further. The point which is really raised for consideration by the opponents of the Bill, is not the propriety of passing the Bill in the abstract, but the propriety of passing it under the present circumstances of the country. I venture to think that there is nothing in those circumstances to take the Bill out of the operation of the general principle above adverted to.

For what are those circumstances? It is said that to invest even a small number of Native Magistrates, as this Bill proposes to do, with jurisdiction to try Europeans accused of criminal offences, is to interfere, to some extent, with the foundations on which British power rests in this country. With all due respect for the quarter from which this argument comes, I must say that I find it very difficult to consider it seriously. No one is more ready to admit than I am that in the present circumstances of the country the existence of British rule in India is absolutely necessary for her advancing in civilization. But I cannot see that the foundations of that rule are in any way injuriously affected by the provisions of the Bill under consideration. The fundamental principle laid down by successive Indian authorities for years past, from provincial Governors to the Houses of Parliament, is that Natives of this country should be associated, gradually, it may be, but still steadily, and more and more largely, in its administration. And the contention that the very short step now proposed to be taken in furtherance of that principle will in any way dislocate, so to speak, the foundations of British power here, is a contention which can only be accepted by one who is prepared to condemn as short-sighted politicians all the most eminent Englishmen who have studied Indian questions—from Elphinstone and Malcolm to Fawcett and John Bright. The British Empire in India does not rest on European placemen for its pillars. And if it did, it is not so weak and tottering that the addition of a few Native placemen or even their substitution for European placemen, need shake it in the slightest degree. But then it is said that the prestige of the British name will be gone if European accused persons are made triable by Native Magistrates, and British prestige is a most potent factor in the stability of British power in India. When the notion of prestige is made to do duty in this way, one may, I think, be pardoned for treating it very much as Carlyle did. But the truth is that the prestige of the British name, which ought to be sedulously guarded, is not the prestige of its might, but rather of its capacity and its readiness to do right. The former will be of but little avail if the latter is sacrificed. And how can the sacrifice of the latter be avoided if in the face of the great Proclamation of 1858, such distinctions as those which this Bill seeks to remove are kept up year after year and decade after decade, without even any slight and gradual interference? How can that sacrifice be avoided if the Government, which lays down an inflexible rule about the right of Mahar boys to go if they please for their education to the nearest public school, will nevertheless prevent Native complainants from going for redress against a European to the nearest of the established public tribunals of the land? But further if there is anything in the argument from prestige, it is conclusively answered by two observations from two different points of view. First, under the law as it stands, and as it has stood now for many years, in all civil cases wherever instituted, and in criminal cases in the Presidency towns, Europeans are already subject to the jurisdiction of Native judicial officers. And secondly, under the proposed Bill, Europeans and Natives are very far, even now, from being placed on a par in the Mofussil. In the face of these considerations it seems to me impossible to attach much weight to this argument from prestige.

A good deal has been said about the absence of public criticism in the Mofussil, and the difficulty of getting the help of competent counsel there; and something has also been said about the ignorance of Native Magistrates regarding the manners and customs of Europeans. I do not wish to deny that there is some force in these circumstances. But the first two of them apply as much to the cases of Native as of European accused persons. And as to the last, most of the persons on whom the jurisdiction is likely to be conferred will be men, who, by their education and their modes of living and thinking, will know a good deal more about the manners and customs of Europeans than European Magistrates ordinarily know about the manners and customs of Natives. Why then should not the Native Magistrate be trusted to administer justice as well to Her Majesty's European subjects as European Magistrates generally do to her Native subjects? And here, I think, it deserves to be remembered, though it seems not to have weighed at all with those who have publicly spoken on this subject, that if it is necessary for a judge to be familiar with the manners and customs of the class to which the person to be tried belongs, it is at least as necessary for him to be familiar with the manners and customs of the class to which the witnesses whose evidence has to be weighed belong. It follows, therefore, that in some important respects the Native Magistrate would actually be better equipped than the European Magistrate to try even those fabricated cases against Europeans about which we have heard and read so much during the past few weeks, and to detect that perjury about which such exaggerated and sensational statements have been frequently made.

I have not in the above remarks considered the suggestion that Native Magistrates will consciously do injustice to a European accused person merely because he is a European. All I need say upon that suggestion, which has been made in some quarters, is, that it is entirely unfounded. From all I know of my countrymen in Western India, and from all I could learn of my countrymen in Bengal while I was among them in connection with the duties of the Education Commission, I can confidently assert that there is no foundation for that suggestion, or for supposing that any such hostility to Europeans exists among educated Natives as the suggestion seems to imply.

It is further objected to this Bill, however, that no inconvenience has yet arisen which renders the proposal embodied in it necessary. Although I am no friend of over-legislation, I cannot accept this view. If I find a provision of the law, not defensible in principle, occasioning injury and inconvenience to any portion of Her Majesty's subjects, I think that provision ought to be abrogated. And if innocent persons, concerned as prosecutors or witnesses in cases where Europeans are the accused persons, have to be hurried over long distances from their homes, I consider the injury and inconvenience thence resulting to be grievances which claim redress at the hands of Government. The Procedure Code of 1872 took one step towards granting such redress. The present Bill takes another. I quite accept the view that there would be a good deal to say in favour of leaving things alone if the question was one merely between a sentimental desire for jurisdiction on the part of Native Magistrates, and a sentimental objection to such jurisdiction on the part of the European community. But that, I hold, is not the question here. The invidiousness of the distinction sought to be removed is only one consideration in favour of the change proposed to be made in the law. The anomalous, and sometimes practically inconvenient, results of that distinction and its inconsistency with the Queen's Proclamation are other considerations bearing upon the point which must be weighed together with the substantial injury to prosecutors and witnesses above alluded to. For my own part, I concede, or rather I ought to say I maintain, that the authorities should proceed gradually in the operation of curtailing these or any other personal privileges valued and long enjoyed by any class of Her Majesty's subjects. That I consider to be a sound principle of legislation. But applying that principle to the case now before us, I cannot perceive that any satisfactory and workable change could be suggested, which without being illusory, could be much smaller than the change proposed by the Bill.

This brings me to the details of the Bill, and it appears to me that no reasonable objection can be taken to section 2 and following sections. The only part of the Bill which seems to me fairly open to consideration is section 1. I have myself no practical suggestion to make regarding that section. But regarding the reference to Cantonment Magistrates in it, I must confess that I do not quite understand it. As regards the other three classes of officers mentioned in that section, they seem to me to stand on pretty much the same footing. But I do not think that there is any reason for preferring those who would fall under clause (b) of that section to the Deputy Magistrates who belong to the Uncovenanted Service. I confess that I have personally a very strong objection to the whole legislation by which the so-called "Native Civil Service" was constituted, nominally to supplement, but in effect to supplant, the Native Civil Service which formed an integral part of the great Covenanted Civil Service of Her Majesty. And if any one suggested the removal of clause (b) from Section 1, I should not be inclined to oppose that removal if, for no other reason, in order to induce Government to reconsider the whole subject of the admission of my countrymen into the Covenanted Civil Service. But under the law as it stands it would seem to be difficult to place the members of the classes designated in clauses (a) and (b) of section 1 on any unequal footing. It might, perhaps, be better to strike out clauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) and simply give power to the local Governments to invest any Magistrate of the First Class with the powers of a Justice of the Peace. This, doubtless, confers on the executive Governments powers which, in strict principle, ought to be exercised by the Legislature directly. But strict principles cannot be logically applied where compromises have to be effected. And in this particular case the executive Governments are sure to be familiar with the probable results of the exercise of such powers on those who may be affected by them.

Upon the whole, then, I venture to give my voice, without hesitation, in favour of the principle of the Bill in question. If any changes in section 1 are likely to disarm the opposition to the Bill which has unfortunately arisen, I would humbly recommend their being accepted. The feeling which has given birth to that opposition is one which in some of its forms commands my sympathy, and I should be disposed to go a considerable way to avoid doing it any unnecessary violence. But a supporter of the Bill is not the best person to suggest any such changes as I have alluded to. At all events, having none such to suggest, I can only submit respectfully the general recommendation made above.

In conclusion I beg to apologise for the delay which has occurred in sending this reply by reason of pressure of other business.

Dated 12th April, 1883.

From—J. GORDON, Esq., Secretary, Bombay Chamber of Commerce,
To—The Under-Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, Bombay.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 2260 of the 2nd instant, forwarding a letter from the Government of India, Legislative Department, No. 246, dated the 17th March last, and of a Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, with the Statement of Objects and Reasons which accompanied it, and requesting that Government may be favoured with the opinion of the Chamber on the provisions of the Bill.

The proposed amendments were discussed at a General Meeting of the Chamber held on the 6th of March last, and the proceedings of the Meeting and the Memorial of the Chamber thereon, dated 22nd idem, were duly forwarded to Government.

The Committee direct me to say that if any further expression of opinion is wanted now, or may be desired hereafter, the Chamber will be happy to furnish it.

Dated 10th May, 1883.

From—H. W. PAYNE, Esq., Chairman of the Bombay Law Society,
To—The Under-Secretary to Government, Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 2262 of 1883, dated 2nd April 1883, with its enclosures.

1. I placed the letter before the Committee of the Law Society, and the Committee after discussion passed the following Resolution:—

That the Committee while thanking the Chairman for his courtesy in placing before them the letter in question, consider that its object is to elicit the individual opinion of the Chairman on the subject to which it refers, and are of opinion that the objects for which the Society is constituted will not be furthered by inviting a discussion among its members on the subject.

2. In explanation of the latter part of the Resolution of the Committee I beg to say that the Society is composed of the Solicitors of the High Court, European and Native, and the main objects of its constitution are to maintain the honourable character of their branch of the profession, to bring to the notice of the Court any malpractice of any of its members, and generally to promote the interests of its members as a body.

3. As the Committee considered that my individual opinion was called for, I respectfully beg to submit my views on the subject of your letter.

4. After very careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that the proposed amendment of the law will not be beneficial.

5. As an abstract question I quite admit the right of every inhabitant of India not to be subject to any judicial disqualification based merely on race distinction; but while admitting that right, I think it impossible to admit its application to the fullest extent where it conflicts with other rights or customs, or to the circumstances under which the Government of India have to legislate for the people of this country.

6. If it is asserted that, being a right, therefore it ought to be applied without regard to any other question, I do not see where one is to pause between the adoption of that principle and leaving the people of India to govern themselves.

7. The question seems to me to be—Will the proposed amendment of the law add to the contentment or happiness of the people of this country? Will it promote good order, and, involved in the above, is it in accordance with the state of things under which the Government of India has been established and rests?

8. First, to consider the grievance it is proposed to remedy, now, the principal objection of the educated native to his disqualification to exercise judicial powers over European British subjects in the Mofussil is that it is a stigma on his race and on his judicial integrity.

9. If it be such a stigma, it is shared by natives of almost all oriental countries. All the European States and the United States of America have insisted on the exclusive right in most of those countries of trying their own subjects in criminal cases by their own Consuls. Nations, such as Turkey and China, who are not wanting in pride, and who have at least as keen a sense of national feeling as the natives of India, have never made any great difficulty in conceding these claims of the European States. They appear to have acquiesced in them as fit and natural and carrying no stigma. The natives of India themselves have not been slow to recognise the advantage of such exclusive rights in the dominions of His Highness the Imam of Muscat. And it is certain if the British were to leave India to-morrow, all the European States and the United States of America would insist upon this right of excluding the natives from exercising judicial power in criminal cases over their subjects.

10. But I contend, rightly looked at, that there is no real stigma cast upon the natives by the exclusion at all, and it is only a feeling of false pride which has been unfortunately fostered and fanned into existence which has led the educated natives to take up this question so warmly.

11. In proof of the foregoing remark I would point to the circumstance that most civilised nations where jury trials exist have recognised, in the institution of mixed juries for the trial of foreigners, the principle that the tribunal which pronounces on the guilt or innocence of a man charged with a criminal offence should not be such that the accused can beforehand disclaim confidence in its justice. The principle is also maintained in the Criminal Procedure Code in that a native can claim to be tried in Courts of Sessions by a jury, the majority of whom are not European British subjects (section 275); they have also the right of challenge on the ground of alienage, and European British subjects have similar rights.

12. I am not aware that the persons who are excluded in these cases from trying the accused consider themselves insulted because they are expressly excluded merely on the ground of race distinction, and I cannot see any difference between a Judge and juror; both have to pronounce on their consciences on the guilt or innocence of the accused, and in giving judgment on questions of facts both stand exactly on the same footing and are supposed to be of equal capacity.

13. The truth is that, the natives of India would not think the disqualification of a Native Magistrate to try a European British subject a grievance at all if it were also the law that the native could claim to be tried by a Native Magistrate, which claim, as a matter of right, stands on a higher footing than the claim of the Native Magistrate to try Europeans. It is, however, in the present state of things, impossible to allow of this right to the natives; but, that being so, is not a reason for taking it away from European British subjects who cherish it as a custom and for other reasons, in order that some few natives may not feel the distinction between the two races in this particular.

14. The real grievance therefore is that there is any distinction at all between Natives and European British subjects in the Government of this country, but that must remain.

15. To suppose that the mere doing away with this disqualification of the Native Magistrate will have any appreciable effect in abolishing the feeling of race distinction and so be likely to add to the contentment or happiness of the people, I think is taking an extreme view which is not justified by the facts.

16. It is after all a very small matter compared with what any thoughtful native must see who looks around him.

17. The British Government, however beneficent its intentions, is after all to the native a foreign Government, compelled by its position to maintain a foreign army and a civil administration mainly composed of foreigners, and keep under its own exclusive control the whole policy of the country, and to tax the people with their consent.

18. In fact, if he looks into the Criminal Procedure Code itself, he will still see that it contains important privileges in favour of European British subjects. I do not see how it can be reasonably expected that the doing away with this disqualification will promote the happiness of the people of this country. I think it will so far from allaying agitation only add to it, and the natives of India will not act like rational beings if they do not ask for a great deal more.

19. While therefore there is no real grievance, and the benefit to be derived from the proposed amendment appears very questionable, on the other hand it is a very serious matter to the European British subjects who are to be made subject to the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates, and as regards the efficiency of the Native Magistrates themselves. Rightly or wrongly the European British subjects are strongly opposed to it. It is said, of course, by those who support the Bill that this is the result of race prejudice. This may be unfortunate, but it is a fact which no amount of legislation will get rid of, and will only be brought forward more prominently whenever any question, such as this one, arises for discussion. The Statute Book will still contain anomalies of legislation which are only justified by it. It meets us at every step in our daily conduct as citizens or in social life. It is only the truth to say that the foundations of the British power in India rest upon it. It is useless to ignore it. The question to ask is, it being there, will the decisions of the Native Magistrates in the Mofussil, in cases where Europeans are concerned, command respect? The object of all criminal laws is to deter and not to punish, and if the tribunals are not trusted, more than half the effect of punishment is lost. The accused is no longer in the eyes of his countrymen a criminal but a victim to race prejudice, the evil influence of which is sure to be charged to the unfortunate Native Magistrate whose duty it may be to condemn. This will not add in my opinion, to the well-being of either Natives or Europeans, and will only be a fruitful source of ill-feeling between them.

20. Independently of this European British subjects have a profound feeling that in the Mofussil where they are scattered about, often in remote districts, they will be subjected to false charges before Native Magistrates which would never be brought before an European Magistrate.

21. The pain, anxiety and expense that an accused may suffer or be put to, though he may afterwards be declared innocent, may often be as great a punishment as any sentence the Magistrate may have power to inflict; and I do not consider the right of appeal as by any means a sufficient safeguard. Courts of appeal do not readily disturb findings on fact unless they can be shown to be manifestly wrong, and it is only in exceptional cases where there is not at least some sworn evidence to support a finding.

22. It may be said that the foregoing is sufficiently answered by the fact that Native Magistrates have been for many years acting in the Presidency towns, but I do not think these exceptions form any just answer, the circumstances being altogether different. All the safeguards of a vigilant press and the facilities of legal assistance are wanting: besides, the European in the Mofussil is often alone without another European or even a respectable native near him. In the Presidency towns he is surrounded by others of his own class, and any transaction which may involve him in a dispute with a native is likely to be known to others who can bear witness for him.

23. Again, it is argued that the Native Judges of the High Courts have power to exercise full criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects; this is true, but I would beg to point out that the Native Judges do not sit alone in disposing of such cases; and the Native Judges of the High Court are chosen from native gentlemen who have had a long and very extensive practice in the High Courts as advocates and have obtained in their long residence in the Presidency towns an intimate acquaintance of affairs and special knowledge of Europeans and their manners and customs, which I do not think can possibly be attained by a native civilian, though he may have passed a short time in England. The native candidate for admission to the Civil Service must, during the period he is in England, pass his time in close application to his studies. When he comes out to India he is, in all probability, posted to some station in the Mofussil where he lives in a world of his own. I do not think that such a training is calculated to make any man a good judge of men or things, or to drive out the strain of hereditary predispositions which all writers on this subject declare exist for many generations until counterbalanced or overwhelmed by other influences of a more powerful character.

24. These remarks apply more forcibly to the members of the Native Civil Service constituted under the Statute 33 Vic., Cap. 3.

25. If administrative difficulties are apprehended by reason of the admission of large numbers of natives into the Civil Service, and an amendment of the law is thought necessary, then I would prefer to see that amendment take the form of permitting natives to have the right to claim to be tried by a Native Magistrate; any inequality in the law would then be got rid of, and I do not think much inconvenience would arise from it, as in my experience natives, as a rule, have no preference to be tried by a Native rather than by a European.

26. In conclusion, I beg to add that the proposed amendment of the law will, in my humble opinion, do more harm than good; that there is no necessity for it, as there is no well-founded complaint that justice is not properly administered on the present basis; and that as the present controversy has shown the European British subjects as a body to be violently opposed to it, and as they will be in the main affected by it, all the proposed benefit to be derived by the change in the law will be lost.

Dated 9th May, 1883.

From—D. S. KEMP, Esq., Secretary to the Trades' Association, Bombay,
To—The Under-Secretary to Government, Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your No. 2263 of 1883, dated the 2nd April, covering copy of letter from the Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department, and copy of Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, with its Statement of Objects and Reasons, and requesting for the information of Government a statement of my opinion on the provisions of the Bill.

Under another cover I forward to the address of the Chief Secretary to Government a memorial signed on behalf of the Bombay 'Trades' Association by the Secretary and myself, against the Bill. At the same time, in compliance with your request, and with the cognizance of my colleagues on the Committee, I willingly take this opportunity of expressing my individual opinion thereon.

The small extension of Native jurisdiction which will be the immediate and necessary effect of the Bill, is in my opinion unobjectionable, and, under a strict and watchful Government, the gradual admission of a moderate proportion of Native gentlemen of adequate education and training and imbued with the instincts of law, would not be a measure attended with danger. If this were all that the Bill provided for, it would in my opinion receive extensive support among the European community. But its scope is much greater.

The 1st section disqualifies European British subjects, not Magistrates of the First Class, from being entrusted with the powers of Justices of the Peace in the Mofussil. This provision, which does not appear to be contemplated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, seems to be an unnecessary accompaniment to the amendments embodied in Sections 3, 4, and 5. It will lower without any compensating advantage the status of European British subjects, and deprive them of the sense of responsibility which such status inspires. It will also have the probable effect of depriving isolated districts of the country, thinly sprinkled with Europeans, of an important moral guarantee for public order and stability. In case of occasions arising for the use of force in such districts, either to preserve the peace or in the interest of justice, circumstances readily suggest themselves under which the counsels of a European who, in his capacity of Justice of the Peace, had a right to be heard, would be of the greatest service in restraining the impetuosity, or strengthening the hands of the Native authorities. Two recent instances of coercion, the Junagad massacre, and the expulsion of Beluchi vagrants from the Bhusaval Railway Station, sufficiently illustrate Native impetuosity on the one hand and British coolness and self-restraint on the other.

It appears from the same section that the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects is to be extended not only to Natives who have received the training considered necessary in the case of European Civilians, but to those also who may be nominated without competition under the new Native Civil Service Rules, and to Native Uncovenanted Servants, of whose qualifications there is no statutory guarantee. Under these circumstances stronger grounds than have yet appeared are in my opinion necessary to persuade Europeans to surrender without protest what they have always considered as a cherished right—the privilege of being judged by their own countrymen. As the administration of justice has always been regarded as one of the most sacred functions by Englishmen, it is naturally claimed that the guarantees for its faithful exercise should not be relaxed. It is said that if a judge is qualified to administer justice to Natives, he is qualified to judge Europeans. But this is to proceed on the premature assumption that the general administration of justice in this country has been purified and elevated up to the English standard. Even were it possible that in times of tranquillity little or no miscarriage of justice should arise, yet any public excitement could not fail to re-act to the prejudice of justice, on minds which had not received the proper legal training, like those of non-competition Native Civil Servants.

For the reasons stated shortly above, I venture to think that the Bill should not pass in its present form. It seems right to grant extension of jurisdiction to Native Magistrates, but this ought to proceed step by step, both as regards the spheres or localities of their jurisdiction and the class of officers to whom it is granted. It seems as fallacious to bulk the whole of the Mofussil together for the purposes of this Bill as it is to treat all Native Civil Servants, Covenanted and Uncovenanted, as one class.

Dated 12th May, 1883.

From—W. R. FINCH, Esq., Manager, Indigo Concern, Shapore Oondie, Tirhoot,

To—The Most Noble the MARQUIS OF RIPON, K.G., Governor General of India.

It is with feelings of the most profound respect for your honesty of motive and diffidence as to my own powers that I venture to address you on the matter of the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill, a matter more serious than any which has occupied the attention of Government since the terrible days of the Mutiny.

Many angry words have been uttered, and bitter things written, and you, My Lord, would be more than human did not all this stir in you feelings of hostility to the utterers; but I submit, My Lord, that the merits of a case are not always to be gauged by the address of the advocate, and I would urge you, in the name of fair play, which, as an Englishman, you ought to possess, to put aside all anger from your bosom, and to approach and consider the subject in a calm manner.

It is one that affects many in position and, as a consequence, in purse. Then be patient, My Lord, in hearing and bearing. When men's interests are touched, they do not always use the language of moderation, and Your Lordship should remember that Englishmen have ever been accustomed to speak out, and not, like the Oriental, express their meaning in honeyed words. It is, My Lord, the strong conviction and the knowledge that they have right on their side that has enabled them to speak trumpet-tongued even on Cæsar's threshold; and Cæsar must listen.

For no fault or failing why are a loyal and devoted body to be deprived of their one privilege?

We are strangers amongst strangers, and our own ewe lamb is to be taken from us.

Deprive us, My Lord, of pay and place, these are in your gift, and only surrounded by such restrictions as equity places on you; but deprive us not of our most treasured privilege, and place not an Imperial race under the heel of an alien one—one that has never known freedom or liberty as we understand it. Remember that races physically cowardly are rarely morally brave. Moral courage is a most necessary qualification in rulers.

Do the men on whom you propose to confer such power as contemplated in this Bill show any sign of being different to their fellows in this respect?

Liberty is a tree of slow growth, and the blood of brave men was shed before it grew in England to its present magnificent proportions. Moral fibre is a produce of that tree: that tree a stranger to this soil.

You, My Lord, are a peer, and can claim to be tried by your peers. You are not even subject to be tried for your life and liberty by the ordinary men of your race, but you must be tried by your equals in rank. Then respect the privileges of those below you.

Now, My Lord, I humbly ask you to consider whether you would like this privilege to be taken from you. You would have even your countrymen trying you: how much less would you like a jury of foreigners sitting on the bench. My Lord, consider your own large privileges of being a representative in our country without any will or voice of the people. You have your rights as a peer. No one grudges you these rights, because God has not made all men equal. Why should you then try to equalize? It is against the natural order of things. Put yourself in our places, working here in a foreign land amidst aliens, in a climate which prematurely ages, even if life be given to work in; and ask yourself is it fair to surround us with more difficulties than we already contend with? This merely to remove an anomaly, and to confer further dignity on a particular few.

To injure the feelings of the many for the sake of the few is contrary to polity.

My Lord, do you consider that the universal voice of those affected by this Bill has been raised out of merely race-prejudice and hate? No: this unanimous protest has been caused by the deep-seated conviction that fair play will not have full swing, that our liberty will be in danger, and that we shall be placed in a position which will be misunderstood.

It is not the lust for power that we are credited with by our opponents that has stirred up the community affected, nor the desire that because we are conquerors, that therefore the right of might should be enforced, and those subjected by arms should be ground down and never again be allowed to rise.

My Lord, be fair to your countrymen. It is said in Sacred Writ that "there is safety in the counsel of the multitude." Listen to that counsel.

Credit your fellow-countrymen with not having lost all feelings of fair-play because they are here; believe that there are some hearts honest in intention, and not unkindly in their feeling to our Native fellow-subjects, and remember that we who cry out are those who have had most experience of the people.

If our Native brethren are fit to wield the power of trying us, why should the army not be open to Native Commissioned Officers? Why should there not be Native Volunteer Corps? Why should the Arms Act be in force?

India is a land of anomalies, the races heterogeneous you rule, and your duty to keep peace between them. Is this measure calculated to promote this peace?

Our privilege is our anomaly; let us keep it, or sweep every anomaly away.

My Lord, other and abler pens than mine have written, and the great in State, Law and Commerce have spoken; therefore it behoves me to say little in the way of argument; but ere concluding I would earnestly ask Your Lordship to consider that have you ever read in the history of men of a universal cry like this going up that had not more than mere prejudice and pride at bottom as its cause?

My Lord, seek yet more deeply for that cause.

No. 3429, dated 21st May, 1883.

From—C. G. W. MACPHERSON, Esq., Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I am directed to forward herewith a memorial from the Bombay Trades' Association, to the address of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council, on the subject of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Dated 9th May, 1883.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the MARQUIS OF RIPON, P.C., K.G., G.C.B., G.M.S.I., Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The Memorial of the Bombay Trades' Association.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That at a General Meeting of the Members of the Bombay Trades' Association held on the 14th March 1883, to consider, among other business, the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, Amendment Bill now before the Legislative Council of India, it was resolved that a memorial be addressed to Your Excellency in support of that which had been resolved upon by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, and praying that the said Bill might be withdrawn.

2. That the Members of this Association concur with the views expressed in the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce addressed to Your Excellency, and dated the 22nd March 1883, in which they pray that the proposed legislation may be abandoned as being premature and unnecessary.

3. Your memorialists submit that, in Mufassal districts, where all influence and court surroundings are Native, Europeans are already at great disadvantage in seeking the protection of justice or access to the judicial authority, that they are thus deprived of much of the legal protection to which they are entitled, and that this state of things will be aggravated if the judicial officer is not a European.

4. That in the administration of justice in this country, many anomalies exist to the advantage of Natives of India, which more than sufficiently countenance the so-called anomaly in favour of Europeans now proposed to be removed; that some of these are considered by legal authorities to be grievous hindrances to justice and have no parallel in European countries; and that the fact of their existing in civil procedure while the Bill now before Your Excellency deals with criminal, does not affect the argument. Natives might gauge the alarm produced among Europeans by the proposed Bill by contemplating the excitement which would attend a proposal to remove some of these anomalies.

5. Your memorialists submit that all civilized free communities become reconciled to anomalies which are the results of compromise, and that, in the conflicts of race, compromises are the only results which are final.

6. That your memorialists regard the proposed amendment with the greater alarm, because, by the rules framed under Your Excellency's predecessor, Native gentlemen are yearly appointed to the Civil Service without that guarantee of previous education and training, which is exacted from English candidates in competitive examination.

7. That your memorialists notice with the greatest apprehension and surprise the proposal to disable the Supreme or Local Government from nominating European British subjects other than Magistrates of the first class to be Justices of the Peace for the Mufassal; and they have been unable to discover any motive for this change either in the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the Bill or any circumstances which have come to their knowledge.

8. Your memorialists earnestly hope that the Bill now before the Legislative Council of India may not be passed into law.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable GEORGE FREDERICK SAMUEL, MARQUIS OF RIPON, K.G., P.C., G.C.B., Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The Humble Memorial of the Native
Inhabitants of Bombay at a Public Meeting assembled—

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists observe with much satisfaction the Bill introduced into Your Excellency's Legislative Council, on the 9th February last, for the purpose of amending certain grave defects existing in the Code of Criminal Procedure at present in force in this country. These defects had been for many years past the subject of very considerable complaints which found formal and pointed expression in Your Excellency's Legislative Council in March 1882, when the present Code was passed and when an amendment having the same object as the present Bill was brought before the Council and withdrawn only upon a promise given that the subject would receive early and more careful consideration than could be bestowed on it at that time.

2. Your memorialists beg at the very outset to disclaim any desire for the removal of any privileges enjoyed and really valued by any particular class of Her Majesty's subjects when those privileges are such as involve no injury to any other class. But your memorialists hold that the privilege continued to British-born subjects of Her Majesty under the present Code of Criminal Procedure is one which, besides being singular as the only class privilege recognised in the administration of the criminal law, does involve injury, and very serious injury, to other classes of Her Majesty's subjects in this country; and they further hold that the curtailment of that privilege as attempted in the Bill now under discussion is in its extent the slightest that could be looked upon as at all meeting the circumstances of the case.

3. The administrative inconveniences which have been occasioned by the maintenance of the privilege in question; the inconvenience, not to say injustice, which parties to and witnesses in Criminal proceedings in which European British subjects are the accused persons, are put to in consequence of that privilege; the mark of inferiority which it implies on one gradually increasing class of officers in Her Majesty's Service, and the occasional injustice which must be expected to occur in the distribution of the various administrative districts to those officers if the said privilege is maintained untouched; all these are considerations which, taken together, ought, your memorialists submit, to strongly weigh with the British Government in India, having regard to the policy of that Government as often authoritatively declared, and nowhere in better or more forcible language than in the great Proclamation of 1858, in which Her Most Gracious Majesty used the following memorable words:—

“We hold ourselves bound to the Natives of our Indian territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to all our other subjects, and those obligations, by the blessing of Almighty God, we shall faithfully and conscientiously fulfil.” And again, “it is our earnest desire.....to administer its government for the benefit of all our subjects resident therein. In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security, and in their gratitude our best reward. And may the God of all Power grant unto us and to those in authority under us strength to carry out these our wishes for the good of our people.”

4. Your memorialists gladly admit that the principles above referred to have, in a general way, and to some extent, practically guided the Government of our country, and the history of British Indian administration in the past exhibits a constant, if somewhat slow, progress of equalising the status before the law of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. Your memorialists accordingly consider the Bill in question as only one short step in the direction in which British policy in this country has uniformly progressed. And they can therefore only deplore the spirit of partisanship which the Bill has roused in a section of Her Majesty's subjects. But they cannot help feeling that that spirit has not been roused by this Bill alone, and that behind that spirit lies a strong antagonism to the whole policy of the present Government of India—a policy, which, your memorialists submit, is not only just and beneficent in itself, but is also in consonance with, and is the proper outcome of, principles which have been laid down for upwards of half a century by successive Parliaments, Secretaries of State for India, and the Governments of India, and above all, calculated to promote the best interests of both England and India.

5. Your memorialists maintain, that when the principle is once admitted that the natives of this country ought to be appointed in gradually increasing numbers to posts in the service of Her Majesty which in their ordinary functions include the trial of offences committed by European subjects, a very strong case is made out for such legislation as is attempted in this Bill. It is the duty of the statesman to provide in due season for an adaptation of the whole administrative machinery to that principle before an overwhelming number of cases actually arise in which such adaptation may be specifically required.

6. Your memorialists would crave leave to add a few words upon certain specific points made in connection with this subject.

7. The existence of this anomalous and invidious distinction which the Bill seeks to remove is sought to be justified by the assumed incapacity of Native Magistrates to deal with cases in which British-born subjects are concerned. The grounds alleged for this assumption are:—(1) that Native Magistrates are likely to be swayed by race prejudices; (2) that they are not sufficiently acquainted with European manners and customs; (3) that much perjury prevails in India; (4) that false and trumped up charges are often brought against innocent parties; (5) that the aid of experienced counsel cannot be had in the mufassal.

8. First.—As to race prejudices, it must be remembered that the Magistrates who are to be entrusted with jurisdiction over Europeans will of necessity be tried and trusted servants of Government, who have gone through years of training, and who have by their qualifications attained high positions such as those of District Magistrates or as Session Judges. The other persons who are eligible for these extended powers are those Covenanted Civil Servants, Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates only, who have been especially selected by Government to be Justices of the Peace.

9. Your memorialists would respectfully submit that it is impossible to suppose that any one of these Magistrates—most of whom must necessarily have been educated in England and have thus come into social contact with Europeans—could entertain any hostile prejudices against the English people. Surely the blessings of English rule—which no one knows better, which no one appreciates better, than the educated natives of India—are calculated to produce not a feeling of hostility, not a feeling of prejudice against the English people, but rather a feeling of respect, gratitude and admiration. The idea, therefore, of wilful injustice must, your memorialists submit, be dismissed as a gross and unjustifiable libel, unfair alike to the English Government in India and to the Native Magistrates.

10. Wilful injustice being thus out of the question, is there any reasonable ground for supposing that Native Magistrates are more likely to be unconsciously swayed by race prejudices than their European colleagues? In considering this question one must not forget the high training the Magistrates in question must have received before they are entrusted with the powers proposed to be given under the Bill,—nor the fact that Hindu Magistrates try every day questions in which Hindus, Parsis and Mussulmans may be opposed to each other, and vice versa. Now it has never been alleged that Hindu, Mussulman or Parsi Magistrates unjustly convict persons belonging to a different race or creed from their own. Then why should it be supposed that these Magistrates would be unjustly influenced by race prejudices in the case of Europeans only?

11. As to want of acquaintance with European manners and customs, your memorialists submit that this is not true in the case of Natives who have been educated in England, or even those who have received a high English education in this country, and who have for years mixed with Europeans in their own country and in India on a footing of equality and friendship. On the contrary, your memorialists would submit that Covenanted Native Civil Servants are likely to be better acquainted with European manners and customs than many European Magistrates are, and can generally be, with the habits and customs of the natives of this country.

12. In regard to perjury and false and trumped up charges, and the absence of counsel, surely experienced Native Magistrates are as well able to deal with these difficulties as their European colleagues, or rather more, from their intimate knowledge of Natives. These difficulties are not alleged to be confined to European cases only, but to occur in all cases. But if the Magistrates are able to detect perjury and to discover trumped up charges, even in the absence of counsel, when levelled against the natives of this country, surely they would be equally able to detect them when they have to try cases in which Europeans are concerned.

13. And your memorialists submit that the multiplication of railways and the telegraph has made it easy for parties to engage counsel, or to communicate readily with the Government or the High Courts, which could not have been done in former times; while the High Courts in India have now been invested with ample powers to transfer cases on all occasions where such a step may seem desirable. If then these Magistrates are admittedly competent to administer justice to the millions of India—it can hardly be seriously argued that they are unfit to deal with the few cases in which Europeans are concerned. Your memorialists cannot believe that Natives are more governed by race prejudices than Europeans. They think that quite the contrary is the fact.

14. Under these circumstances, your memorialists would respectfully ask whether it is just, dignified or politic to have one set of scales for administering justice to the Natives of this country and quite another for Europeans? Whether our Courts are good enough for trying questions of life and death for the 200 millions of Her Majesty's Indian subjects but not fit to try even the most trivial questions in regard to Englishmen, and whether the present exceptional and anomalous provisions of the law are not calculated to lead the Natives of this country to believe that they are intended more to screen European offenders than to secure impartial justice?

15. Lastly, your memorialists emphatically deny the gross misrepresentation that the Natives of this country care nothing for this Bill. They, on the contrary, assert that they are keenly and deeply interested in it. They have watched, and will continue to watch, its fate with the most intense anxiety. In the opinion of your memorialists the principle involved in this Bill is of the most vital importance to their interests and welfare. The question really is, whether the Natives of this country—no matter what their qualifications, their attainments, their learning, their experience, and their services in the cause of their country may be—are always to be treated as an inferior race of men; whether that inferiority is constantly to be marked by invidious and galling distinctions? And this question, as already indicated, has now to be considered as part of the still larger question: whether India is to be governed upon the righteous principles which were announced by Her Most Gracious Majesty and have guided Your Excellency's enlightened policy, or upon those of the opponents of this Bill?

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, shall for ever pray.

On the platform were deputations of native gentlemen from the following places:—Ahmedabad, Broach, Poona, Sholapore, Surat, and Veerungaum. The meeting was also attended by a deputation from the Anjuman-i-Islam of Bombay. With the exception of three or four Europeans, the audience was entirely composed of natives.

Mr. Raghunath Narayan Khote, C.I.E., Sheriff of Bombay, in opening the meeting, said—Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy and gentlemen—A requisition has been addressed to me by a most representative and influential number of gentlemen of all classes of the native community of Bombay. The requisition is to the following effect:—"We have the honour to request you to be good enough, to convene at an early date a public meeting of the native inhabitants of Bombay, to take place at the Town Hall, for the purpose of considering the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure now before the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Viceroy, the Governor-General of India.—We have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servants, Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, Munguldas Nathubhoy, and others." "In compliance with the above request I hereby convene a public meeting of the native inhabitants to be held at the Town Hall, on Saturday, at 4 p. m." Gentlemen, my concern at the present moment is merely to open the meeting by declaring that it is duly convened. I need simply ask you to elect your own Chairman, and to proceed to transact the business which has brought you together: but in doing so it is impossible for me to play altogether a mechanical part. (Hear, hear.) It is impossible for me not to feel a sympathy with the motive of this meeting, nor is it possible for me to omit to give expression to that sympathy. It has been said that Mr. Ilbert's Bill affects only the Europeans in India, and that natives have no concern with it whatever. Can sophistry go further than this? (Applause.) It is true that whilst the European population of the country are opposing the abrogation of what they naturally feel is their legitimate privilege, natives on the other hand cannot sit silently and allow a measure to be shelved which promises to remove a disability that has hitherto rested on them by reason of their nationality. (Cheers.) If the natives remain quiescent, their inaction is liable to be misunderstood. They will be set down as extremely apathetic and indifferent, and unfitted by reason of this very silence of theirs for the removal of the disability that has attached to them. (Hear, hear.) The Government of India and the Provincial Governments and Administrations see the gross injustice and the practical inconvenience daily caused in the administration of the high charge which is entrusted them; and they are striving hard to remedy the evil. If we remain apathetic and silent, it might greatly weaken the hands of the Government, for advantage might be taken in England of our silence and apparent neglect; and the measure which we all hail with so much joy might be declared by the British Parliament as uncalled for. (Hear, hear.) It has been in the anxious contemplation of some people whether a medium course (and this is a fit case for a compromise) is not possible, such as might meet the convenience of the administration of criminal justice by the State; a course which, whilst it answered on the one hand the objections raised by the European population, would remove the disability of which the natives could justly complain. (Hear, hear.) Such a happy compromise would prevent the heart-burning between the two races, which is calculated to be daily increased if the present measure passed into law; for whenever any case involving race prejudices arose, the sore would open and keep festering. (Hear, hear.) I have reason to believe that some such compromise is already under the consideration of Government, and I devoutly hope that whatever course is ultimately determined upon, it will be such as will not only disarm to a great extent, if not altogether, the opposition now offered against Mr. Ilbert's Bill, but also remove the disability which attaches to our countrymen under the present law. (Applause.) Gentlemen, we may be quite sure that in a matter of such grave and national importance as this, the Government here and the Parliament in England cannot but be imbued with an anxious and sincere desire to do full justice to all parties concerned. Their one grand aim must be the greatest good of the greatest number; and while holding the scales of justice evenly towards all, they must so shape their course that no animosity of the races under their sway should be excited by anything they enact, or that the weak be overridden by the powerful while they look passively on. (Applause.) It is quite unknown, nor can I imagine, what final conclusions Government will arrive at regarding this matter; but of one thing we can be certain, and that is that they will devote to the subject the gravest and the most patient deliberation which it is possible for them to bestow upon it. (Applause.) Before I conclude, gentlemen, I earnestly trust that your proceedings will be characterised by such a dignified and dispassionate bearing as the gravity of the subject before you so imperatively demands. Let us be worthy of ourselves. (Cheers.) And now, gentlemen, I will leave the chair and request you to elect your own Chairman and proceed to the business of the evening. (Applause.)

Mr. Nosservanjee M. Petit then proposed that Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, Bart., should be requested to take the chair.

Mr. Vurjeevandas Madhowdas seconded the proposition, which was agreed to.

Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy then took the chair amidst much cheering. He said—Gentlemen,—I confess to a sense of embarrassment at being called upon to preside at this large and distinguished gathering, and could have wished that the task of addressing such a meeting as Chairman, on such a subject as has called us here to-day, had devolved upon some abler speaker. Nor is it conventional modesty that prompts this expression of my wish, for I see around me representatives of all sections of the native community—Hindus, Mahomedans, and Parsis—gentlemen occupying a prominent position in their respective spheres of life, and well known for their ability, independence, and public spirit. (Cheers.) That the occasion is one which justifies such a large and influential gathering will be easily understood. (Hear, hear.) You are aware, gentlemen, that we have met to-day to support an attempt at remedying an anomaly in the administration of the Criminal Law of the country—(applause)—an anomaly the removal of which the altered social and political conditions of India call for. (Renewed applause.) If this alone were our object, it will need all your endeavours to strenuously support it, as being a legislative measure intended and calculated to remove an unnecessary and invidious distinction between European and Native judicial officers, founded, not as we believe, on the question of personal fitness, but only on differences of race. (Cheers.) But our special object is to support an important principle involved in such legislation—to vindicate the wise, noble, and benevolent policy of the present Government of India from the unreasoning alarms of short-sighted statesmanship (applause), and to beseech the House of Commons and the Supreme Government to once more emphasise and carry out the solemn pledges and assurances given to the country by successive Parliaments and Secretaries of State for India and Indian Governments (cheers). This is an object which may well call for all your energy and earnestness. I need not tell you that such a policy, conceived in such a spirit of enlightened liberality, if faithfully and consistently carried out, would in the end be found to be the best preservation of the friendly relations between Europeans and Natives, both in political and social regards. (Hear, hear, and applause.) So much has already been said for and against the Bill and the principles involved in it, and the results which the carrying out of such principles would have on the administration of the country, that I will not take up your time here by going over the same ground. I will only exhort you to discuss the main object here with all the temper and coolness you can command, without going into irrelevant matters or raising side issues. (Hear, hear.) We in Bombay have, during the different stages of the controversy which the recklessness of some excitable persons on the other side of India has done so much to embitter, pursued a most dignified and honourable course, and discussed the burning question like sober, practical men of business, without being carried away by prejudice or feeling. (Hear, hear.) I have such confidence in the good sense and moderation of this meeting which I have the privilege now to address, that I believe no unpleasantness will mar the proceedings of to-day. (Hear, hear.) I will only add that the present is the most opportune time for the natives of the country to approach the House of Commons on the subject, and assist it to decide the very important issues raised, with temperate and carefully reasoned memorials. These will show that the natives of India, so far from being indifferent to the proposed Bill and the broad principle underlying it, watch the policy to which that Bill owes its origin with the keenest interest. (Applause.) We regard it as a step in the right direction which the present conditions of the country loudly call for, and as a mere instalment of those liberal concessions which, we all confidently expect, will be made to us hereafter. (Hear, hear.) Let us confidently rely on the noble traditions and instincts of the justice and liberality of the House of Commons, whose verdict we will calmly await without any misgiving, as we feel sure that it will be swayed not by ignorance or prejudice, but by the most thoughtful, just, prudent, and liberal counsels. (Applause.) Before I sit down I may inform the meeting that deputations have arrived from Poona, Sholapore, Ahmedabad, Surat, Broach, and Veeramgaum, and there is also a deputation from the Anjuman-i-Islam. A letter has been received from Sir Mongaldas Nathoobhoy, expressing his regret at being unable to attend the meeting, and another from Mr. Byramjee Jeejeebhoy, C.S.I., who has been prevented by sickness from being present on the occasion. Also a letter from Mr. Franjee Nosservanjee Patel, expressing regret for not being able to attend, was received. With these remarks I call upon the Hon'ble Budroodin Tyabjee to move the first Resolution. (Applause.)

The Hon'ble Budroodin Tyabjee, who was received with loud cheers, said : Mr. Chairman and gentlemen,—I think I have been present at a great many public meetings on various important occasions, some of them held in this very Town Hall, but I do not remember to have ever witnessed a larger, a more influential, or a more representative gathering than I see before me this evening. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, the occasion which has brought us together is indeed an important one. We have met together for the purpose of discussing calmly and dispassionately, and I trust without loss of dignity to ourselves or injustice to others, the proposed amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure. Gentlemen, whatever may be the feelings excited elsewhere, whatever may be the causes which have given rise to those feelings, whoever may be responsible for them, I think we the citizens of Bombay have indeed good reason to congratulate ourselves upon the comparatively serene atmosphere in which we have the good fortune to live. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I am one of those who think that strong, passionate, or abusive language is the surest sign of a bad cause. (Applause.) And so convinced am I of the truth of this saying that I should indeed be sorry if a single word, expression or sentiment dropped this evening either from my own lips or from those of any other speaker that could be justly held to give cause of offence to any section of her Majesty's subjects, and specially to that important European community with whom it should be our constant aim to live in peace and harmony, and, if possible, on terms of friendship, and to whom, in spite of recent occurrences, we must always look up with more or less of respect, esteem and even admiration. (Loud cheers.) But, Gentlemen, if I thus counsel moderation, it is certainly not because I don't feel indignant at the unparalleled insults that have been offered to our whole Indian community at a great public meeting recently held in the metropolis. (Applause.) But because I am anxious that our countrymen should afford a striking, a memorable example of forbearance and self-restraint, even under the most trying circumstances, and because I am convinced that no language that we could use could add one jot to the severity of the condemnation which has already been pronounced upon the Calcutta proceedings by no less a personage than Her Majesty's representative in India, in no less a place than the Supreme Legislative Council when His Excellency the Viceroy—(Loud cheers)—denounced the language of the Calcutta orators as the language of "violence, of exaggeration, of misrepresentation, and menace." (Loud applause.) Now, gentlemen, what are the proposals of the Government of India that have given rise to all this heated discussion, to all this violent agitation? They are simply to invest a very small and select number out of the ablest, the most experienced, and the most distinguished of our Native Magistrates and Judges with an infinitesimal jurisdiction over European British subjects! (Applause.) Gentlemen, the proposals are in themselves so small, and but for the principle involved so utterly insignificant, that it would indeed have required the power of prophecy to have foretold the storm that has burst over Calcutta and overwhelmed the European community there, in a whirlwind of passion, prejudice, excitement, and even frenzy. But, gentlemen, however much we may regret this ebullition of feeling, however much we may consider it unjustifiable, it yet behoves us I think in a case of this kind where the interests of privileges, real or imaginary, of the European community are concerned, to inquire carefully into their allegations, and to see if there is really any foundation for the alarm which they profess to feel. Now, gentlemen, what are the grounds on which this violent opposition to the bill is sought to be justified? First, it is alleged that the Native Magistrates and Judges are likely to be swayed by their race prejudices in the decision of cases against Europeans. But, gentlemen, is it true in the first place that we Natives of India have any such prejudices? Is it true that we entertain any hostile feelings towards the European community? Gentlemen, I beg to give that statement the most emphatic contradiction. I have known Englishmen who entertain the strongest prejudices against the Natives of India, who look upon them as an inferior order of beings—(ironical cheers)—who refuse to associate with them on anything like terms of equality, but I have not come across a single Native of India who entertains similar feelings towards the European community. (Loud cheers.) But, gentlemen, even assuming for a moment the existence of these race prejudices, what reason is there for supposing that our Native Judges and Magistrates are more likely to be swayed by them than their European colleagues? Do not Hindu, Mussulman, and Parsi Judges and Magistrates every day dispose of cases in which the parties appearing before them belong to races, creeds and nationalities entirely different from their own? (Hear, hear.) Then what ground is there for believing that these Judges and Magistrates who hold the scales of justice with perfect impartiality in the case of all other communities should lose their balance of mind in the case of Europeans only? Gentlemen, I am convinced that this difficulty about the race prejudices, so far as we are concerned, has no existence but in the imagination of the opponents of this Bill, and I am inclined to think that in advancing this argument they have unconsciously let the cat out of the bag, they have in fact been judging by their own standards. (Hear, hear, and applause.) But, gentlemen, it is further alleged that a great deal of perjury prevails in India, that false charges are often brought against innocent parties, and that the absence of counsel and of public criticism would make it impossible for the Native Judges and Magistrates to dispense impartial justice to Europeans. But surely, gentlemen, these difficulties have been vastly exaggerated. India cannot boast the monopoly of perjury. The famous claimant Tichborn was not a native of India (Loud applause.) But so far as these difficulties do really exist, they exist in all cases. (Hear, hear.) They are more or less inherent in the administration of justice. They are not peculiar to cases where Europeans only are concerned. They are not confined to Native Magistrates only. A European Magistrate has to contend with these difficulties no less than his Native colleagues. He cannot get rid of them by the mere superiority of his race. The only means which will enable him to cope with them, are not the place of his birth or the colour of his skin, but precisely those qualifications which will be found in the Native Magistrates and Judges to whom this Bill will apply, viz., great natural abilities, high legal attainments, and a ripe judicial experience. (Hear, hear.) But, gentlemen, if our Native Magistrates and Judges possess enough of these qualifications to overcome these difficulties in the thousands of cases that come before them where other communities are concerned, why are we to assume that they would fail to do so only when Europeans are brought before them? (Hear, hear.) Surely, gentlemen, it is but reasonable to suppose that our Native Magistrates and Judges, considering the peculiar position of the European community in India, would use more care and caution in dealing with Englishmen than even with their own countrymen. But, gentlemen, it is further alleged that our Native Magistrates and Judges are not sufficiently acquainted with the habits and customs of the European community, especially the lower orders. If this is a sound argument, every European Judge in India ought to be at once deprived of his jurisdiction over the Natives of the country! For what can be clearer than that even the highest of our judicial officers, even the Judges of the High Court, know but little of the masses of the Native community. (Hear, hear.) If our Native Covenanted Civil Servants who have spent years in England, who freely mix with the best classes of the European community in India, are incompetent to try European offenders, by reason of their imperfect knowledge of the habits of the accused, it follows that European Judges, fresh from England and knowing not a word of the Indian languages, must be still more unfit to try the Natives of this country. (Applause.) This is surely a reductio ad absurdum. The truth, gentlemen, is that, although a special knowledge of ways of the accused is not without its use, what is really essential in the administration of criminal justice is, a sound knowledge of the law and a thorough acquaintance with the world combined with ability to appreciate evidence. It seems to me therefore, gentlemen, that unless the Government is prepared to admit that the whole administration of justice in India is utterly rotten to the core, that our Magistrates and Judges, both European and Native, ordinarily dispense, not justice, but injustice, or in the alternative, that the present exceptional and anomalous machinery of the law is provided and kept up, not so much for securing impartial justice, as for screening European offenders, unless one or the other of these preposterous conclusions is admitted, it will be impossible for His Excellency the Viceroy to attach the smallest weight to arguments founded purely on these considerations. (Applause.) But, gentlemen, it is further argued that it is a highly cherished privilege of the European community, and that it ought not to be taken away, because it causes no injustice to the Natives of this country. But, gentlemen, what can be greater injustice than to compel an unhappy complainant who may have a grievance against an Englishman, to undertake a long and tedious journey, at great cost and inconvenience to himself and his witnesses in search of a European Magistrate, because forsooth the Native Magistrate near at hand is incompetent to dispose of the charge, by reason of his race. Further, gentlemen, what can be greater injustice to the whole Indian community than to declare even the ablest of our Native Magistrates and Judges, no matter what their qualifications may be, as an inferior order of men, incapable of rising to that height of judicial excellence which is supposed to be necessary to try cases against Europeans? Gentlemen, I venture to think that the present state of the law is not only unjust, but it is insulting to us. (Cheers.) It is insulting to us, first because it brands even the ablest, the highest, and the most distinguished of our judicial officers with a galling and a perpetual mark of inferiority. (Renewed cheers.) It is insulting to us because it draws an invidious distinction between the European and the Native members of the same Covenanted Civil Service. It is insulting to us because it exalts the European British subjects into such superior beings as to declare that even the highest of our judicial officers shall be incapable of imprisoning him a single day or fining him a single rupee; and it is insulting to us because it degrades our own countrymen to such a depth as to declare in the very next breath that the same incompetent and unfit Magistrates and Judges, who are incapable of trying even the most trivial case of assault against an Englishman, are yet fit and competent to try millions of our own countrymen for the gravest charges, and even to condemn them to death? (Long and prolonged cheers.) Gentlemen, the height of absurdity could go no further, and yet forsooth these are the arguments ostensibly put forward for the purpose of defeating this just, generous, and above all extremely moderate and cautious measure. But, gentlemen, I believe that the real opposition to this Bill is founded, not upon any sincere apprehensions as to miscarriage of justice, not upon any belief in these flimsy arguments, the hollowness of which I have had no difficulty in exposing, and which are not likely to deceive any candid politician, much less the sagacious statesman into whose hands the destinies of this great empire have been committed, but upon a dislike, more or less conscious, more or less intense, of the whole of Lord Ripon's administration. (Hear, and applause.) Gentlemen, there is a large section of the Anglo-Indian community which cannot fully reconcile itself to that fundamental principle which has been so often declared and repeated over and over again by successive Viceroys, Ministers, Secretaries of State, Parliaments, and even by Her Gracious Majesty herself,—that principle, the recognition of which forms the key-note to the whole of Lord Ripon's policy, that principle on which are based all our political rights, just hopes and legitimate aspirations; that principle, namely, which declares that the Natives of India are entitled to a just share in the administration of their own country, and that a mere difference in race, colour or creed shall not be just ground for distinction in political treatment. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, there is no principle better grounded in moral justice or political wisdom. Other Viceroys there have been who have accepted and recognized this principle in words, but Lord Ripon—(cheers)—is the only who has had the courage, the sagacity, the generosity, the prudence and the firmness to give effect to it in deeds. (Applause.) Gentlemen, they must indeed be short-sighted politicians who cannot see the justice and wisdom and the perfect safety of this principle. Lord Ripon's policy, founded on a just and generous treatment of the Natives of this country, so far from losing England's hold upon India, will rivet it and chain the affection of the people to the throne. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I have great faith in the justice and the firmness of the Government of India, but I have still greater faith in the noble instincts and the love of fair play which characterize the British Parliament and the British public; but, gentlemen, if the introduction of this Bill was in the first instance wise and politic—as I think it undoubtedly was—the passing of it now has become a matter of absolute political necessity. (Applause.) The withdrawal of the Bill under the present circumstances could be looked upon as nothing less than the surrender of right and reason to passion and prejudice—as the triumph of turbulent agitation, however wrong—over calm and respectful representations, however just and well-founded. (Applause.) Gentlemen, the moral effect of such a proceeding upon our vast and varied populations cannot fail to be disastrous in the last degree. But if, on the other hand, this Bill, even with the modification mentioned by my friend the Sheriff, becomes law now—when it may yet be accepted as a simple act of justice, no less voluntary than graceful and not merely as a concession—as ten years hence extorted by irresistible popular agitation it will—it will be so far from shifting themes if on the other hand, the Bill becomes law, now, as I hope and trust it will—when it may yet be accepted as act of justice no less voluntary than graceful and not merely as a concession as ten years hence, extorted by irresistible popular agitation, it will so far from shifting or weakening the foundations of the British Empire in India consolidate and strengthen them. (Cheers.) Let Lord Ripon's generous and enlightened policy be continued, and India, instead of remaining as at present a source of weakness to England, will become a tower of strength; the British power, instead of resting upon the bayonets of the soldiers or the craven fears of a conquered and abject population will rest upon the far more honourable—and the only, and I venture to think, true—firm and endearing foundation, viz., the affections and the gratitude of a happy, prosperous, and contented people. (Loud applause.) I beg to move “that in the opinion of this meeting the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure is necessary for the just and impartial administration of justice, and is in consonance with the righteous policy which the British Government has followed in the administration of this country. (Applause.)

Mr. Pheroza Shah M. Mehta, who was received with loud and prolonged cheers, said: Mr. Chairman and gentlemen,—In rising to second the resolution which has been just moved by my honourable friend Mr. B. Tyabjee, in a speech which you will agree with me in admiring as equally remarkable for its ability and eloquence as for the studied and dignified moderation of its tone (Cheers), I confess that I undertake the task which has been assigned to me with some degree of trepidation. Within the last few days we have been generously inundated with advice to preserve the utmost judicial calmness and moderation, without the slightest admixture of even judicial severity, not to allow an angry word or syllable to escape us, while we are also to put forth our case with force and vigour. Now, gentlemen, this advice is more easy to preach than to practise, and though I have resolved to use my best endeavours to achieve this golden mean, I cannot quite escape a feeling of some nervousness as to the success of this rather difficult experiment. (Laughter.) But, gentlemen, I have one consolation that, in whatever I may say, I will be guided by two sentiments of which I am firmly and sincerely conscious, and which will never permit me to say anything which will be needlessly offensive or malicious. (Hear, hear.) If I entertain one political conviction more strongly than another, it is that this country, in falling under British rule, has fallen into the hands of a nation than which no other is better qualified to govern her wisely and well. Look among all the leading nations of the world, and you will not find one who, both by her faults and by her virtues, is so well adapted to steer her safe on the path of true progress and prosperity. (Cheers.) It is true that the English are a stubborn piece of humanity who might well be asked sometimes to take to heart the exhortation addressed once to the chosen people of God, “Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiff-necked,” but it must be acknowledged, at the same time, that it is perhaps this very trait which has preserved this country from rash and extreme experiments and has put it on a path of sure, though slow, development. (Cheers.) Secondly, in setting up as a critic of Englishmen in India, I fully recognise that I do not set up any claim of superiority; I do not set up as a superior person who could have done better under similar circumstances. On the contrary, gentlemen, I believe most of the Natives who have devoted any thought to this subject are ready to recognise that if they were placed in the position of the dominant race, God knows how they might have strutted before high Heaven and performed antics which might make angels weep. (Hear, hear.) At the same time, gentlemen, I feel confident that Englishmen will frankly admit that this circumstance gives them no immunity from criticism, nor gives them any right to be impatient if they are judged by the principles they themselves have introduced and taught as the principles on which their work in this country must be finally judged. (Cheers.) The nervousness which I have admitted is therefore allayed by the consciousness that even if I err, I will not set down aught in malice. My fear and trembling, however, are not quite at an end, and that is in consequence of the attitude which our European friends have taken up in regard to the public expression of Native opinion on this Jurisdiction Bill which we are met here to consider to-day. That attitude is not unlike that of the amiable Scotchman described by Charles Lamb, who pitched into you for your presumption, if you ventured to go in for praise of his great national poet, and performed the same operation on you for your ignorance if you dared to find fault with him. (Laughter.) Much in the same humour, our European friends are disposed to rebuke us for our obstreperousness, if we make bold to express our opinion of this Bill in public meeting assembled, and are just as ready to take advantage of us on the score of our indifference if we sit quiet without blowing the feeblest counterblast to the incessant sounding of trumpets and clashing of cymbals, which is kept up even until now all over the country, to fright away this poor little Bill. (Laughter and applause.) This attitude may lay claim, I admit, to some amount of rather grim humour, but I trust our European friends will not be very hard upon us, if we refuse to be tossed about in this manner on the two horns of such a dilemma as they present to us, and prudently hold fast by the one which does us least injury. But as soon as we decide, gentlemen, after anxious consideration, to hold a public meeting, another mine is sprung upon us. We are told that we have no concern with this Bill at all. (Laughter) ; that it is only a little matter between Lord Ripon and the Europeans in India, in which the parties have got rather hot with each other, that, in fact, we have no locus standi at all to take part in the argument. Now, gentlemen, of all the cool and astonishing things which have been said in the controversy on this Bill (and they are not few), it seems to me that this is about the most cool and astonishing. (Applause.) For nothing can be clearer than that the Natives have the most immediate and vital concern in the subject-matter of this Bill. I do not refer here to the handful of Native Civilians who might get extended jurisdiction under it. I do not speak here of the educated English-speaking Natives, who might be supposed to sympathise with Native Civilians. But I speak of the masses of the Native population, and I say that they are as directly and strongly interested in this Bill as any European British-born subject. (Hear, hear.) As sure as there are two parties to an offence—the offending party and the suffering party—both, the one as well as the other, are interested in the trial in which they are respectively to appear as complainant and accused. Either may suffer by a miscarriage of justice. As courts of criminal law are constituted in the mofussil, the interest of the Natives is still more close and vital. If a European commits an offence against a Native, the latter has seriously to consider whether it would be worth his while to bring the offender to justice, remembering that he and his witnesses may have to bear no inconsiderable loss of time and trouble and expense in hunting after a qualified Magistrate. (Applause.) Has it ever been inquired into in the course of this controversy how many offences committed by Europeans have never been brought to the cognisance of courts of justice, in consequence of the difficulties thus created by this dear and cherished privilege of being tried by their peers? (Hear, hear.) I can tell you, gentlemen, that the popular impression in the mofussil about this valuable privilege is that, it is simply an immunity practically enjoyed by Europeans from the consequences of a large class of offences committed by them against natives. (Applause.) Only the other day I happened to be at Surat and had a conversation about this bill, not with educated natives, but with true unsophisticated children of the soil from the other side of the Tapti. I will relate to you, gentlemen, the conversation I had with these natives, utterly unspoilt by a knowledge of English, particularly as it is advanced by the opponents of the bill, that the agitation in favour of it is created only by the educated natives, in which the masses take no interest whatsoever. They, the people I speak of, asked me if we in Bombay were not going to stir in the matter and support the bill, as they said that the privilege at present enjoyed by Europeans meant simply in a large number of cases immunity from prosecution altogether, as the trouble and expense of a trial before a competent magistrate were very great, and further as they had a very poor chance in the case of ordinary offences before a European Magistrate, when the offender was a European. And they gave me an instance within their own knowledge of a European (a man not highly placed, be it fairly admitted) who went about bragging in their part of the country that he could ill-treat natives as he liked, as no native magistrate could try him, and no European magistrate would believe any d—d lot of native witnesses. (Laughter and applause.) The word ‘d—d’ is a free translation of my own of the vernacular word used in the conversation. Gentlemen, I do not offer this European as a representative European, or this story either, as a representative story. It is, unfortunately, too much the fashion, both with natives and Europeans, to moralise on isolated instances as if they were always typical ones. But I think this story very forcibly illustrates both the interest which the natives have in the subject-matter of this Bill, and the interest which they take in the controversy and agitation about it. (Applause.) A locus standi, gentlemen, we most assuredly have in this controversy, if European British subjects hold that of the accused, we have the locus standi of the complainants. Now, gentlemen, I don’t propose to take up your time by entering into a discussion of the merits of this bill, after the able and exhaustive treatment of it by Mr. Tyabjee. But all his arguments rest upon one assumption, his inferences follow logically and irresistibly, if there is no question about this assumption. Mr. Tyabjee was perfectly justified in arguing upon the basis of this assumption; for it is founded upon the declared policy of the Crown with regard to the Government of this country. But in the progress of the controversy, the opponents of the bill have perceived that their arguments cannot be maintained till they attacked the wisdom of this policy. So now they deliberately urge that this bill is in itself a matter of little moment, but their fears are aroused as it indicates the shifting of the foundations of British power in India. Denouncing the wisdom of the declared policy of the Crown, or urging that its declarations in that respect were not meant to be practically acted upon, they boldly say that India has been conquered by force and must be governed by force. In preaching this gospel of might with regard to the government of this country, they have found a devoted supporter in England in Sir Fitzjames Stephen, and a somewhat doubtful one in Lord Salisbury. They ridicule the policy of righteousness as one of weak sentiment, and seem almost to adopt, with scarcely disguised approval, the vigorous summary of their position given recently by Mr. Bright—(loud cheers)—in his own peculiarly happy manner, that, having won India by breaking all the Ten Commandments, it is too late now to think of maintaining it on the principles of the sermon on the mount. (Laughter and applause.) Our European friends will pardon me if I say that a good many of them have a sneaking, when they have not a pronounced, partiality for this proposition, while they consider that the platitudes about England’s duty to India, and the other quotations from Lord Macaulay and others about a “policy of national wisdom, national prosperity, and national honour" have no business to intrude in practical politics, but are only good enough to be spouted by native orators on public occasions. (Hear, hear.) For many years the policy of governing India on principles of justice and equality for all the Queen's subjects, of whatever caste and creed, has never been so openly and so furiously called in question as now. It therefore seems to me, gentlemen, that this is a time when, without overstepping the limits of our loyalty or our gratitude, we may properly and justifiably examine the propositions which have been thus advanced, and try to show that the declared policy of the Crown was adopted after long and careful consideration—not on grounds of weak sentiment, that it was adopted not simply because it was a policy dictated by honour and justice (which we cheerfully and gratefully acknowledge that it is), but also because it was a policy dictated by the true interest of England herself, because in no other way could England hope to preserve her great dependency with the greatest amount of safety and profit to herself. (Cheers.) In the first place, gentlemen, it is said that India was won by the sword. Now I say that Englishmen don't do justice to themselves when they read Indian history in this way. Though it cannot be denied that there are many pages in this history blotted by error and crime, England has won India not simply by the sword, but in a large measure by the exercise of high moral and intellectual qualities which have not only guided its victories, but have always been on the alert to neutralise its baneful influences. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, however India was won, can it be maintained with safety and profit by the sword only? This is too large a question to be treated fully in a public meeting like this, but I will lay before you three considerations which, I think, show that it is impossible. First, India maintained by England by the power of her armies would be a heavy burden on her in case of her being involved in European complications. It is utterly improbable that England can always escape being dragged into the contests, rivalries and ambitions of the other European powers. What with France with her desire to extend her colonial empire, with Italy anxious for the African Coast right against her, with Russia intent upon extending and consolidating her power in Asia, with the other powers jealously watching these, however great and powerful England may be, the strain of such entanglements cannot but tell upon her, and one day she may find herself in a predicament in which India may simply hang as a millstone on her neck. (Loud applause.) We must not forget the contingency of the American powers appearing on the scene and complicating matters dreadfully. Ireland is another thorn in the side of England, and what a lesson she teaches as to how hard and difficult it is to undo the mistakes of a policy of force centuries after they were committed! How nobly has England been struggling to redeem the consequences of such a policy, and yet how slowly she succeeds in undoing the mischief of the past! But, secondly, there is another Nemesis attending a policy of force. That policy would require day by day larger English armies and larger English Civil services. In progress of time, large numbers of Englishmen trained in the maxims of despotism and saturated with autocratic predilections, would return to their native home, where they could not but look with intolerance on free and constitutional forms. This is no visionary speculation; careful English observers have already noticed traces of such a tendency. In the course of a few generations such a tendency, if not checked, would develop into a mighty influence, and the free and constitutional government of England which has been so long the pride of the world, would be placed in the deadliest jeopardy. (Cheers.) Rome was once proud of her sturdy freedom and her republicanism; she lost both in the extension of her despotic empire. She has left, however, a valuable lesson, and it has been well and truly said that, for the sake of all that she values most, her own freedom and civilization, England must raise India to her own level, or India will drag her down to hers. (Loud applause.) The third consideration on this point I have to lay before you relates to the benefit to be derived from the commercial intercourse between the two countries. With a policy of force, as I have said before, the resources of India would be drained in the first instance in maintaining large costly armies and huge services; the country would be thus too much impoverished to admit of her developing the great material resources which Nature has showered on her. In India, impoverished and emasculated, the English merchant would only be an emaciated attendant in the rear of the English soldier and the English civilian, and English commercial enterprise, more glorious even than her military enterprise, would find no congenial field. I have thus, gentlemen, very hastily and very imperfectly sketched the consequences to England herself of a policy of force. Now look at the other picture. With India educated, civilised, contented and loyal, what a help she would be to England in her time of need, what a field for commercial enterprise, what reciprocal benefits from intercommunion in every way! (Loud cheers.) How great England is even now, with her Indian possessions governed on the present declared policy of the Crown! She would wax greater and greater with every legitimate development of that policy. I say therefore, gentlemen, that of the two policies on which India could be governed, England has chosen that which will secure her own best interests with those of India herself, (Applause.) When, in the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, India was assigned to the care of England, one can almost imagine that the choice was offered to her, as to Israel of old. "Behold, I have set before you this day a blessing and a curse. A blessing, if ye will obey the commandments of the Lord your God which I have commanded this day; a curse if ye will not obey the commandments of the Lord your God, but turn aside out of the way which I have commanded this day, to go after other gods which ye have not known." England has chosen wisely and well; she has discarded the temptations held forth by the passions of selfishness, prejudice and vain-glory, she has chosen to follow "the Eternal that maketh for righteousness." She has deliberately declared by the mouths of her greatest and most trusted statesmen, she has proclaimed it through the lips of Her Gracious Majesty herself (cheers), that India is to be governed on the principles of justice, equality and righteousness, without distinctions of colour, caste or creed. (Loud applause.) Our English friends, therefore, gentlemen, must make up their minds to discuss this bill on the basis of this declared policy of the Crown. (Cheers). On that basis I say the case for passing the bill is simply irresistible, as my friend Mr. Tyabjee has shewn. I will only refer to one argument which may be shortly described as the 'anomaly' argument. Now, gentlemen, this word anomaly has a good deal to complain of as to the treatment it has received at the hands of the opponents of this bill. Never has any word in the English language before been so cruelly maltreated. But it must sit quiet under its injuries at present, as till the bill is passed, it cannot secure conviction before a European magistrate. This anomaly argument, however, is perfect if it is properly regarded. It derives its force from actual fact and experience. However anomalous the position of Englishmen in India, still it can be made, and has been made, the basis of a righteous policy. In the prosecution of that policy, native magistrates have already exercised jurisdiction over Europeans, with the most satisfactory success in the Presidency towns. Race feeling and native perjury have not been able to mar the experiment. But it is said that that is because of the existence of a public opinion in the Presidency towns which does not exist in the Mofussil. But this plausible argument yields to a close examination. The argument admits that public opinion is sufficient to countervail the dreaded consequences of race prejudice and false swearing. Let us see, then, if in the Mofussil there is not a force which can operate in the same way. I say that there is, and a stronger one than public opinion, that of the official opinion of the European district officers, which would work on the native magistrate more directly, and expeditiously and more closely, as all his interests and predilections and associations would closely connect him and make him 'dependent' on them. (Applause). I say, gentlemen, this argument takes the whole question from the domain of speculation, and brings it within that of observed fact and experience, which establish that native magistrates can be safely trusted with jurisdiction over Europeans. Before concluding, however, I am desirous of saying a word about the storm of passion and prejudice which, commencing in the Calcutta Town Hall, has so spread over the whole land. (Hear, hear.) Some of my native friends are disposed to be very hard upon these angry and excited people. I, for one, gentlemen, however, am inclined to make great allowances for, nay, almost to treat with tenderness, this sudden ebullition of anger and fury, when I realize the real character of it. (Hear, hear, laughter, and applause.) Gentlemen, all men have their nobler and baser instincts struggling within them, and you will find that even in the most well-disciplined organizations, in the most well-balanced minds, after the nobler instincts have well established their sway, a moment comes when the smallest rift upsets the work of years, casts everything into confusion, and generates a whirlwind at which those who knew the men before as good and worthy stand aghast. (Cheers.) So it seems it has been the case with Europeans in India. But this abnormal ebullition lasts only for a short time, and I am sure, gentlemen, that soon after this Bill is passed—(cheers)—as passed it will be, Englishmen will themselves smile at the wonderful things they have said and done about this Bill. (Hear, hear.) At present dire prophecies are proclaimed as to the ill-feeling which has been created between Natives and Europeans by the introduction of this Bill, which is to leave effects for ever so long. Gentlemen, I will, with your permission, indulge in a truer vein of prophecy. The newspapers have recently informed us that Mr. Branson has left for England. (Laughter.) Most probably he will return a short time after this Bill is passed, and there has been time for angry feelings and prejudices to calm down. I can then picture to myself, Mr. Branson and Lalmohun Ghose, as soon as they meet in Calcutta, rushing into each other's arms—(loud laughter)—singing the song,

"As through the land at eve we went,
And plucked the ripened ears,
We fell out, my wife and I,
O, we fell out, I know not why,
And kissed again with tears.
And blessings on the falling out,
Which all the more endears,
When we fall out with those we love,
And kiss again with tears."

(Loud laughter and applause.) In presenting this touching tableau, I say, gentlemen, that this Bill, which Lord Ripon has introduced in the honest and well-considered prosecution of his far-sighted and sagacious administration, holds forth hopeful promises of improved relations between the Natives and Europeans in this country.

The speaker resumed his seat amidst great cheering.

The Honourable Rao Saheb V. N. Mandlik said—Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy and gentlemen, —The task of reading the memorial which is to be adopted to-day has been entrusted to me, and before I carry it out, I take the liberty of submitting a few remarks for your consideration. If it were left to me, I should have preferred to place before you the resolution which I have to propose, without any prefatory speech, because after my two learned friends have exhaustively disposed of nearly all the arguments opposed to the acceptance of the Bill, little is left for me to say on that head. There are occasions when silence may be misconstrued, and I consider the present as one of those occasions. I shall, however, content myself with a few words on matters on which my learned friends have not yet spoken, and to which no reference, except a passing remark, seems to have been made in the voluminous proceedings that have just come to hand of the debate in the Viceroy's Council. I believe, gentlemen, the present Bill is simply the historical outcome of the consistent, continued, high-minded, and generous policy of the Government of British India from the time of the Marquis of Hastings. (Cheers.) I pass over the period of more than forty years, down to the time of the passing of the so-called Black Act, which removed the civil disabilities of the trying judges here. All civil claims could after that Act be tried, and are now being tried, from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, by all judges of all nationalities, according to the powers entrusted to them by the statute law of the country. At the time of the renewal of the last Charter, or rather at the time of the discussions for the renewal of the last Charter, in 1852-53, up came the question of the extension of the powers of proper persons selected from the native community to represent the various administrative branches of the service. Persons of mature experience, like Sir George Clark and Sir Frederick Halliday, questioned, on grounds which some of you might pronounce whimsical, the expediency of admitting natives into Legislative Councils and the superior branches of the service, and their several arguments in support of their views may be found in the Commission Books of 1853. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal (Sir Frederick Halliday) urged that if the natives of this country were appointed to high posts, it would occasion jealousy and other evils; and he mentioned the case of a gentleman appointed to a high office by Lord Dalhousie, in support of this view. But, gentlemen, experience has shown that those fears were groundless. The fact is that within ten years of giving his evidence Sir George Clark himself, in the Durbar-room of this very Town Hall, congratulated his Native colleagues in the Legislative Council on their admission into that assembly to assist the deliberations of Government. (Cheers.) Subsequent experience has shown, and will show, how far the natives have realized the expectations formed of them in the discharge of the important duties of legislators. The next step was to declare the High Courts open to the admission of qualified native gentlemen as judges of these courts, or of those courts which are known throughout the land as the courts of the Queen-Empress. Here, for the last twenty years, every subject of the Queen has been amenable to the civil as well as criminal jurisdiction of qualified native gentlemen who have the honour of seat on the benches of these high tribunals. Experience has also shown that even criminal sessions held by these judges have caused no inconvenience, no public scandal, no injustice, nothing unfair on the part of those who were either being tried, or those who tried them. When I have spoken of the very heads of the judicial administration, you will pardon me for not going into details. However, there is one point which I must here mention. As I have said, the present measure is simply the historical outcome of the educational and political policy of the Government of India. Gentlemen, the political policy was enunciated so far back as 1833, in the discussions which preceded that year with reference to the India Bill, which was passed. But in the educational policy there have been several changes and perturbations, and after the memorable year 1857 there were not wanting many, be they natives of India or foreigners, who attacked the policy of the State, on the ground that the education that was given was not the best calculated to promote the political interests of the British Empire. You will remember that the policy of the Friend of India at the time was, if I may say so without offence, certainly opposed to the interests of the people of that magnificent province where that paper is published, namely, the masses of Bengal. And when I say the masses of Bengal, I do not exclude the masses of their countrymen in other Presidencies. But you must remember that the tone of the paper takes its colour mostly from the writer's predilections for the inhabitants of Bengal. After examining the whole of the policy, in one of the articles which you will find in the early numbers of 1859, the writer pronounces unequivocally that much as he dislikes the young educated Bengali, or for that matter the young educated native, he prefers him altogether to those who are set up against him, namely, the old-fashioned and pliant people of "the good old times." (Cheers.) If, therefore, you review the several periods from 1853 to 1859, from 1859 to 1863, and from 1863 to 1883, you will find that a period of some twenty years has elapsed during which Native Covenanted Civilians have been discharging their high functions to satisfaction. For a period of nearly thirty years natives have been acting as judges of Her Majesty's High Courts. For more than twenty years native gentlemen of education and influence have been discharging their duties to the very best of their power in the various consultative Councils, both of the Supreme Government of India and of the provincial Governments of Bombay, Bengal, and Madras. If any disaster has resulted from any of these measures, if members of the Legislative Council like Mr. Quinton and Mr. James Gibbs—the honourable gentleman whom you have often heard in this hall (cheers)—if these gentlemen tell you that this Bill is an administrative necessity, all I can say is that we are in very good company in supporting a movement which has the approval of several successive Secretaries of State, both Conservative and Liberal, and several distinguished Viceroys, not the least distinguished of whom is the one who now fills to the glory of the British Empire the high office of the Queen's Deputy. (Loud cheers.) If, I say, the Bill, backed up by high legal and constitutional authorities, and by the voice of the impartial public represented by the House of Commons, and having for its object the practical, though it may be the distant, improvement of more than 250 millions of mankind, were presented to the public, and if the public were asked for its vote on the Bill, all I have to say is, that you will pause before you reject such high authorities as are in support of the measure. But seeing how you have received the speeches of my predecessors, I have no doubt that with one unanimous verdict you will say that we should adopt such a memorial as the one which I shall now read and submit to your acceptance. (Cheers.)

The memorial is as follows :—

To His Excellency the Most Honourable George Frederick Samuel, Marquis of Ripon, K.G., P.C., G.C.B., Viceroy and Governor General of India.

The Humble Memorial of the Native Inhabitants of Bombay at a Public Meeting assembled

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists observe with much satisfaction the Bill introduced into your Excellency's Legislative Council, on the 9th February last, for the purpose of amending certain grave defects existing in the Code of Criminal Procedure at present in force in this country. These defects had been for many years past the subject of very considerable complaints which found formal and pointed expression in your Excellency's Legislative Council in March 1882, when the present Code was passed and when an amendment having the same object as the present Bill was brought before the Council and withdrawn only upon a promise given that the subject would receive early and more careful consideration than could be bestowed on it at the time.

2. Your memorialists beg at the very outset to disclaim any desire for the removal of any privilege enjoyed and really valued by any particular class of Her Majesty's subjects when those privileges are such as involve no injury to any other class. But your memorialists hold that the privilege continued to British-born subjects of Her Majesty under the present Code of Criminal Procedure is one which, besides being singular as the only class privilege recognised in the administration of the Criminal Law, does involve injury, and very serious injury, to other classes of Her Majesty's subjects in this country; and they further hold that the curtailment of that privilege as attempted in the Bill now under discussion is in its extent the slightest that could be looked upon as at all meeting the circumstances of the case.

3. The administrative inconveniences which have been occasioned by the maintenance of the privilege in question; the inconvenience, not to say injustice, which parties to and witnesses in criminal proceedings in which European British subjects are the accused persons, are put to in consequence of that privilege; the mark of inferiority which it implies on one gradually increasing class of officers in Her Majesty's service, and the occasional injustice which must be expected to occur in the distribution of the various administrative districts to those officers if the said privilege is maintained untouched; all these are considerations which, taken together, ought, memorialists submit, to strongly weigh with the British Government in India, having regard to the policy of that Government as often authoritatively declared, and nowhere in better or more forcible language than in the great Proclamation of 1858, in which Her Most Gracious Majesty used the following memorable words :—

"We hold ourselves bound to the Natives of our Indian Territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to all our other subjects, and those obligations by the blessing of Almighty God, we shall faithfully and conscientiously fulfil." And again, "it is our earnest desire . . . to administer its Government for the benefit of all our subjects resident therein. In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security, and in their gratitude our best reward. And may the God of all Power grant unto us and to those in authority under us strength to carry out these our wishes for the good of our people."

4. Your memorialists gladly admit that the principles above referred to have, in a general way, and to some extent, practically guided the Government of our country, and the history of British Indian Administration in the past exhibits a constant, if somewhat slow progress of equalising the status before the law of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. Your memorialists accordingly consider the Bill in question as only one short step in the direction in which British policy in this country has uniformly progressed. And they can therefore only deplore the spirit of partisanship which the Bill has roused in a section of Her Majesty's subjects. But they cannot help feeling that that spirit has not been roused by this Bill alone, and that behind that spirit lies a strong antagonism to the whole policy of the present Government of India—a policy, which your memorialists submit, is not only just and beneficent in itself, but is also in consonance with, and is the proper outcome of principles which have been laid down for upwards of half a century by successive Parliaments, Secretaries of State for India, and the Governments of India, and above all, calculated to promote the best interests of both England and India.

5. Your memorialists maintain, that when the principle is once admitted that the natives of this country ought to be appointed in gradually increasing numbers to posts in the service of Her Majesty which in their ordinary functions include the trial of offences committed by European subjects, a very strong case is made out for such legislation as is attempted in this Bill. It is the duty of the statesman to provide in due season for an adaptation of the whole administrative machinery to that principle before an overwhelming number of cases actually arise in which such adaptation may be specifically required.

6. Your memorialists would crave leave to add a few words upon certain specific points made in connexion with this subject.

7. The existence of this anomalous and invidious distinction which the Bill seeks to remove is sought to be justified by the assumed incapacity of Native Magistrates to deal with cases in which British-born subjects are concerned. The grounds alleged for this assumption are:—(1) that Native Magistrates are likely to be swayed by race prejudices. (2) That they are not sufficiently acquainted with European manners and customs. (3) That much perjury prevails in India. (4) That false and trumped up charges are often brought against innocent parties. (5) That the aid of experienced counsel cannot be had in the Mufassal.

8. First as to race prejudices, it must be remembered that the Magistrates who are to be entrusted with jurisdiction over Europeans will of necessity be tried and trusted servants of Government, who have gone through years of training, and who have by their qualifications attained high positions such as those of District Magistrates or as Session Judges. The other persons who are eligible for these extended powers are those Covenanted Civil Servants, Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates only, who have been specially selected by Government to be Justices of the Peace.

9. Your memorialists would respectfully submit that it is impossible to suppose that any one of these Magistrates—most of whom must necessarily have been educated in England and have thus come into social contact with Europeans—could entertain any hostile prejudices against the English people. Surely the blessings of English rule—which no one knows better—which no one appreciates better than the educated natives of India—are calculated to produce not a feeling of hostility, not a feeling of prejudice against the English people, but rather a feeling of respect, gratitude and admiration. The idea, therefore, of wilful injustice must, your memorialists submit, be dismissed as a gross and unjustifiable libel, unfair alike to the English Government in India and to the Native Magistrates.

10. Wilful injustice being thus out of the question, is there any reasonable ground for supposing that Native Magistrates are more likely to be unconsciously swayed by race prejudices than their European colleagues? In considering this question one must not forget the high training the Magistrates in question must have received before they are entrusted with the powers proposed to be given under the Bill,—nor the fact that Hindu Magistrates try every day questions in which Hindus, Parsees, and Mussulmans may be opposed to each other, and vice versa. Now it has never been alleged that Hindu, Mussulman or Parsee Magistrates unjustly convict persons belonging to a different race or creed from their own. Then why should it be supposed that these Magistrates would be unjustly influenced by race prejudices in the case of Europeans only?

11. As to want of acquaintance with European manners and customs, your memorialists submit that this is not true in the case of Natives who have been educated in England or even those who have received a high English education in this country and who have for years mixed with Europeans in their own country and in India on a footing of equality and friendship. On the contrary, your memorialists would submit that Covenanted Native Civil Servants are likely to be better acquainted with European manners and customs than many European Magistrates are and can generally be, with the habits and customs of the Natives of this country.

12. In regard to perjury and false and trumped up charges, and the absence of counsel, surely experienced Native Magistrates are as well able to deal with these difficulties as their European colleagues, or rather more, from their intimate knowledge of Natives. These difficulties are not alleged to be confined to European cases only—but to occur in all cases. But if the Magistrates are able to detect perjury and to discover trumped up charges, even in the absence of counsel, when levelled against the Natives of this country—surely they would be equally able to detect them when they have to try cases in which Europeans are concerned.

13. And your memorialists submit that the multiplication of railways and the telegraph has made it easy for parties to engage counsel, or to communicate readily with the Government or the High Court, which could not have been done in former times; while the High Courts in India have now been invested with ample powers to transfer cases on all occasions where such a step may seem desirable. If then these Magistrates are admittedly competent to administer justice to the millions of India—it can hardly be seriously argued that they are unfit to deal with the few cases in which Europeans are concerned. Your memorialists cannot believe that Natives are more governed by race prejudices than Europeans. They think that quite the contrary is the fact.

14. Under these circumstances your memorialists would respectfully ask whether it is just, dignified or politic to have one set of scales for administering justice to the Natives of this country and quite another for Europeans? Whether our Courts are good enough for trying questions of life and death for the 200 millions of Her Majesty's Indian subjects but not fit to try even the most trivial questions in regard to Englishmen, and whether the present exceptional and anomalous provisions of the law are not calculated to lead the Natives of this country to believe that they are intended more to screen European offenders than to secure impartial justice.

15. Lastly, your memorialists emphatically deny the gross misrepresentation that the Natives of this country care nothing for this Bill. They, on the contrary, assert that they are keenly and deeply interested in it. They have watched and will continue to watch its fate with the most intense anxiety. In the opinion of your memorialists the principle involved in this Bill is of the most vital importance to their interests and welfare. The question really is, whether the Natives of this country—no matter what their qualifications, their attainments, their learning, their experience, and their services in the cause of their country may be—are always to be treated as an inferior race of men; whether that inferiority is constantly to be marked by invidious and galling distinctions? And this question, as already indicated, has now to be considered as part of the still larger question:—whether India is to be governed upon the righteous principles which were announced by Her Most Gracious Majesty and have guided your Excellency's enlightened policy, or upon those of the opponents of this Bill?

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, shall for ever pray.

Bombay, April 1883.

Mr. Nanabhoy Byramjee Jeejeebhoy, who was received with loud cheers, said:—Honourable Sir and gentlemen,—I beg to second the Honourable the Rao Sahib's proposition for the adoption of the memorial. After what has fallen from my friends who have already addressed the meeting I believe very little is left for me to say in support of the memorial, which so forcibly speaks for itself. And yet, gentlemen, as a native of India, as a faithful, though humble, subject of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress, and as a citizen of Bombay, I feel I should not be content with the mere formal seconding of the resolution for the adoption of the memorial. Whatever its intrinsic worth may be, I feel that I should say a few words by way of a brief exposition of its great importance to some of the most vital concerns of my countrymen, the natives of India. I think this to be necessary, the more so when it is urged from quarters, if not quite friendly, certainly by no means deadly hostile to the Honourable Mr. Ilbert's Bill, that it does not concern the natives and, therefore, no natives need interfere in the matter of it, which, again, it is said, must be settled between the Government who have attempted the proposed amendments in the Criminal Procedure Code and the opponents of the same. We are in fact, asked by those who claim to be our friends to be quiet lookers-on as if we were nobodies having anything to do with the subject-matter of the much abused Bill. (Applause.) Now, gentlemen, you will have remarked from what is set out in the memorial that the bill concerns us natives of India as much as any other class of Her Majesty's subjects living or residing within the boundaries of Her Indian Dominions. (Hear, hear.) Our political status, our social well-being, our rights as British subjects guaranteed to us by Acts of Parliament and gracious Royal Proclamations, suggest to us the necessity of seeing the Honourable Mr. Ilbert's Bill become the law of the land. And when urged on by such necessity it cannot be a fault in us if we decline to remain passive observers of what is going on around us or in the country. Duty and interest alike have called us together here to raise our voice in the manner we are now doing in support of the political, necessary, and provident measure of the Government of the Most Noble the Marquis of Ripon. (Loud cheers.) By means of the memorial we shall convince all the world how earnestly we feel the great importance and high value of the proposed measure and render nugatory the misrepresentation referred to in that memorial, that the natives of this country care nothing for the Bill. We for ourselves and on behalf of our countrymen at large state in the most emphatic and unequivocal terms possible that we are "keenly and deeply interested" in the Bill, since the principle therein involved is of the most vital importance to our worldly concerns and welfare. (Loud applause.) That principle embraces the most momentous questions referred to at the end of the memorial, namely, whether the natives of this country, no matter what their qualifications, their attainments, &c., are always to be treated as an inferior race of men, and whether that inferiority is constantly to be marked by "invidious and galling distinctions." A partial solution of this question in a manner fitting the promises and policy of the British Government will be the passing into law of the Bill of the Honourable Mr. Ilbert. Hence the solicitude, and the eagerness of the Natives of India, specially the intelligent classes, to support actively the action of the Government of India in the matter. (Cheers.) Action taken, be it remembered, in consequence of the urgent, clearly pronounced, and oft-repeated wishes of the representatives of our countrymen in the Legislative Council and the public press for some legislation of the kind which the Bill now seeks to provide. We have assembled on the present occasion to prove by our demonstration of this day that we cannot remain passive while the modicum of justice due to our country according to the deliberate Acts of Parliament and solemn Royal Proclamations, is formally granted to us in the manner that the Bill of the Honourable Mr. Ilbert proposes to provide and our countrymen have been persistently praying for. And when doing so nothing is further from our intention and our act than doing the least harm or injury to our fellow British subjects. (Hear, hear.) While seeking for further administrative convenience to the State and agreeable redress from what we feel to be a grievance to ourselves, we have weighed carefully and dispassionately and with a lively sense of all that is due to our fellow British subjects. We have reflected seriously and deeply so as to make our memorial perfectly consistent with our desire to give no ground of just complaint to our European friends. Nor has our task been difficult or unpleasant excepting so far that we have had to do our work against not any valid or reasonable opposition to the Bill on the part of our European friends, but against their unjustifiable prejudices against our countrymen, mistaken notions about their so-called privileges. The same have been disposed of by previous speakers and to the effect as stated in the memorial which I am asking you to adopt. The memorial embraces answers to all the objections hitherto urged against the Bill, and in a manner that all independent judges must admit as sufficient in every sense. It clearly shows that the tendency of the Bill on becoming a pucca Act will be to improve the social and political status of the Natives, to add to the convenience of the Government, to strengthen the cause of public justice and to occasion no harm or humiliation to Europeans such as some of the opponents of the Bill are pleased to imagine without sufficient cause. Gentlemen, I would here refer you to what the state of affairs is under the present law and you will at once see the force of my arguments urging you to support the memorial in order to improve that state as regards the Natives without inconveniencing Europeans as far as the ends of justice are concerned. The introduction of railways and the opening up of other industries in the interior of the country has enabled many Europeans generally of the artizan class to live in the mufassal and it very often occurs that these men come into collision with the Natives, and as the law stands at present any case in which a Native has to lay a complaint against a European, he is under a considerable disadvantage, in that he cannot obtain justice on the spot but must go in quest of it perhaps thirty or a hundred miles away from home where a European Magistrate may happen to be. In the majority of cases the complainant, who is a labourer earning three or four annas a day at the most, is obliged to put up with a wrong rather than give up his work for days together and to take his witnesses to the Court at other considerable sacrifices to himself. It is for the protection of such men, and not simply for the glorification of the native officials that a change in the existing law is called for, and I am surprised that there should be so much alarm exhibited by the better class of Europeans against the just and impartial provisions of the Bill. It is also surprising that foreigners should have joined in the opposition to the Bill, which affects only the limited class of British subjects defined in section 3, clause V, of the Criminal Procedure Code. Those Europeans and Eurasians who fall outside the definition given in the section above referred to, will not be worse than they are now were the Bill to become law to-morrow. They are at present as much liable to be tried by Native Judges and Magistrates as any Native, and if anything, the passing of the proposed amendment will be beneficial to them. I shall show how. Take a case in which a German gentleman in the mufassal has had a quarrel with his English servant or neighbour and the two obtain cross summons against each other. As the law is administered at present, the German could be proceeded with before the Native Magistrate on the spot, whereas the countercharge against the Englishman would have to be forwarded some 50 miles or a hundred to be adjudicated by a British Magistrate and a Justice of the Peace. Under the proposed amendment the German would have equal justice with the Briton and so would the Native. I am surprised at the demand which is being made in certain quarters to have justice dealt out according to the nationality of the opposing parties instead of the merits of the case. The same authorities that now watch the European judicial officer will, we are sure, guide the Native Magistrates on whom it is proposed to confer the extended jurisdiction. Are we to suppose that a man of a Native Sessions Judge's training, education and standing will allow his prejudices, if he has any, to so blind his judgment in any case coming up for trial before him, as to risk the chance of an ignominious dismissal and the inevitable ruin of his official position and professional reputation. The same safeguards which protect Her Imperial Majesty's poor and ignorant Native subjects in the mufassal will watch over her European subjects. Under section 499 of the Criminal Procedure Code even a European Sessions Judge has no power to pass a sentence upon a European British subject exceeding one year's imprisonment. Under section 335 of the same Code, the High Court has power with the consent of the Local Government to hold the criminal sessions at any places in the mufassal. At such sessions it would be competent to a Native Judge of the High Court to try a European British subject and to pass upon him the highest sentence known to the law. Under the statute creating the High Courts a Native barrister of five years' standing or a Native vakeel of ten years' standing is eligible for appointment as a Judge. Considering the block that at present exists in the Civil Service, it would take a Civilian 15 or even 20 years before attaining to the position of a Session Judge. How very anomalous then that a Native barrister of 5 years' standing, if he be so lucky as to obtain a seat on the bench of the High Court, can under the existing law try a European British subject in the mufassal, but not so a Native Civilian with a much greater amount of actual training as a Judge! But anomalies do not end here. Under the statutes obtaining in England any foreigner, much more a Native of British India, can obtain letters of naturalization in England giving him the status of a European British subject. With a view to evade the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates in the mufassal it would be competent to any Native of India by simply going through the formalities provided by the statute to obtain the status of a European British subject as defined by the Code. What the proposed amendment seeks is to confer upon a few well-tried and trusted officials of long service and assured antecedents a certain limited amount of jurisdiction over Europeans for the better administration of justice in this country, and I am fully confident that those men who will be chosen for the exercise of this privilege will do full justice and credit to the choice of the Government and the traditions of the service. Gentlemen, there are many other arguments which I could bring forward in support of the Bill, but I trust sufficient has been said to-day to convince you of the desirability of adopting the memorial, and as other speakers are to follow me, I content myself by seconding the resolution with the above remarks. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Nakoda Mahomed Ali Rogay who was accorded an enthusiastic reception, said—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen,—The resolution entrusted to my care is one which must of necessity be carried by this meeting, inasmuch as it relates to steps being taken for forwarding the memorial just read and adopted to the Government of India. I will not, gentlemen, take up your time by inflicting a speech upon you at this late hour and in this hot room, where we are nearly roasted up here. (Laughter.) But the importance of the occasion demands that I shall adduce some more arguments in favour of the Jurisdiction Bill, in continuation to those which had already been put forward by my friends the Honourable Budroodin Tyabjee, Mr. Pherozeshaw M. Mehta, the Honourable Rao Saheb V. N. Mandlik, and Mr. Nanabhoy Byramjee Jeejeebhoy. (Hear, hear.) The opponents of the Bill have laid a serious charge against the Viceroy of India, namely, that in introducing Mr. Ilbert's Bill in his Council he is actuated by the anxiety of being popular among our countrymen. (Laughter and applause.) On calm consideration of the subject and the conduct of the Viceroy ever since he took the reins of Government, you will see how unfounded that statement is. You know how sensitive we were on the question of the abolition of the import duties, how our papers and public meetings held at the time denounced the Government and showed the depth of Native feeling on that subject, and yet the Viceroy, if he had been a popularity-seeking man, could even, if he were not powerful enough to resist the determination of the Home Government, easily have expressed an opinion against the import duties, as Lord Northbrook had done on another question, and as he himself, the present Viceroy, had done on the question of the payment of part of the cost of the Egyptian war by India. (Cheers.) This fact, taken in connection with his action in regard to the License Act, the Arms Bill, and the Vernacular Press Act, shows that the charge against the Viceroy being a popularity-seeking man is entirely unfounded and is based only on the imagination of the opponents of the Bill. (Loud applause.) The Vernacular Press Act, you will remember gentlemen, was passed by Lord Lytton; and Lord Cranbrook, who was our Secretary of State at the time, and a conservative, did not quite approve of it, and in a despatch on the subject laid down certain rules for the operation of the Act which made it to a certain extent harmless. (Cheers.) Both Liberals and Conservatives were to a certain extent agreed that the Act was perfectly unnecessary, and yet our Viceroy, immediately after taking the reins of Government, but waited and watched its operation, and then acted according to the dictates of his conscience. (Loud applause.) So much for the charges brought against the Viceroy of India of being a popularity-seeking man. (Hear, hear.) It has been alleged that the extension of the jurisdiction over European subjects to Native Magistrates will cause acts of injustice in the mufassal, but that argument has been ably disposed of by Mr. Pherozesha Mehta. (Hear, hear.) In Presidency-towns European of the higher status and rank, and all the members of their families, are subjected to the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates. If such high personages are subjected to the jurisdiction of our Magistrates, why on earth there should be any objection against the extension of the same privilege to the mufassal I cannot conceive. Are not public opinion and the public press necessary in every part of India to expose any act of injustice done to any class of Her Majesty's subjects, be they European or Native? I ask you that question. The answer is simple—They are. (Hear, hear.) Well then, where is the argument? It is simply absurd to say that only for the trial of Europeans public opinion and the public press are necessary in the mufassal. (Cheers.) There is not the least doubt that there are cases on record in which both European and Native Magistrates have committed acts of injustice, but these cases, I think you will all agree with me, are very few. (Hear, hear.) But the mere fact of there being such cases on record does not make European Magistrates, as a class, unfit to try Natives, nor on the other hand does it make Native Magistrates unfit to try Europeans. (Loud applause.) The only correct criterion for judging these matters by is, I think, the fitness of each official entrusted with magisterial powers to whatever class he may belong. Judicial training, long experience, and a reputation of being a good judge, are necessary for every class of Magistrate. It is just as dangerous to entrust full powers to inexperienced European members of the Civil Service as it is to any inexperienced Native member of the service. In both cases the necessary qualifications are experience and a reputation for judicial training, and nothing more. (Hear, hear.) In Ceylon, which is also a British possession, no such distinction of race existed as in apparent is this country. Those people who have been asserting that the passing of this Bill would check the flow of European capital into India have only to go to Ceylon to see how much European capital has been sunk in coffee and cinchona estates, and yet there exists no such distinction of race, and there has been no cry from the European residents in that colony. (Loud applause.) One of the local English papers here, only three days ago, sneered that this agitation in favour of the Jurisdiction Bill is confined to English-speaking Natives of India, and that the mass of the people, one and all, are in favour of the European agitation in regard to the Bill. (Loud laughter.) I must confess, as one of the English-speaking Natives, and one who has a more intimate knowledge of the masses than any European can boast of, that, so far as my information goes, I have not been able to authenticate the assertion made by this paper. (Renewed laughter and applause.) It may be that the editor of the Times of India may have some superhuman power of judging the feeling of the Natives. (Great laughter and cheering.) I will give you an instance of how Europeans regard Natives which came under my observation in travelling from Nugger to Puna in October last. Soon after my arrival at the junction where the Puna train meets with two European fellow-passengers, a party of European and Native soldiers came from Puna and halted there to catch the train from Dhond to Nugger. The European soldiers had, unfortunately for our peaceful slumbers, taken too much of something or other, and they created such a row by yelling and shouting that it was impossible to sleep. I was walking on the platform, and heard the Native soldiers speaking together, about the prizes won at the rifle match when one of the European passengers, a gentleman of military appearance, came up and bullied them for talking so loud and disturbing the passengers in the waiting-room. (Laughter.) Of course the poor fellows stopped, and said in a very low whisper one to the other, "See the justice of the Saheb. The European soldiers have been yelling and shouting, and no notice is taken, but while we have only been talking a little we have been bullied." (Cheers.) That is the feeling of the masses in such cases of injustice, and therefore the assertion made by the Times of India is altogether unfounded. (Cheers.) I only hope that this measure will be passed, and I am sure the results of the working of the Bill will be as has been ably described in the poetry quoted by Mr. Pherozesha Mehta, which I need not repeat, but which you have all got in your memory at the present moment. At the same time, if we had not called this public meeting the enemies of the Bill would have said: "This agitation is confined to Bengali Baboos only. Mr. Gupta is only a Bengali Magistrate; it is only a local matter." But they forget that a question which affects Bengali Baboos affects all the Natives of India. (Loud applause.) Our seeming indifference, had we remained silent, would have been taken advantage of by those who want a privilege, the enjoyment of which is injurious to our interests, to be retained on the statute-book. (Cheers.) I see, gentlemen, that you are all impatient. (Hear, hear; no, no, and laughter.) I am always unfortunately placed at meetings of this kind, and cannot therefore do justice to the subject. (More laughter.) And my notes have been taken away by my friend Mr. Mehta. (Great laughter, which continued for several moments.) At the same time; you have been saved from the infliction of a speech which, so far as it went, I must admit was a poor one. (No, no, and laughter.) I have one consolation in sitting down, however, that able speakers who preceded me have adduced sufficiently potent arguments to carry the resolution which I have to propose, namely, "that the Committee of the Bombay Branch of the East India Association be requested to take necessary steps for forwarding the memorial to the Government of India." (Applause.)

Mr. Dinanath Raghunath Khote, who was accorded a warm reception, said,—Gentlemen, I have very great pleasure in seconding this proposition, which is only a natural sequel to your unanimous approval and adoption of this memorial. (Hear, hear.) It is necessary that the Government of India should be made aware of the views and opinion of the Natives of this country, as a body, in regard to the Jurisdiction Bill, and the forwarding to them of this memorial as the outcome of a meeting such as we have here to-night, of a fully representative character, will, in a measure, have the desired effect. (Applause.) Now, while commending this proposition to your favourable consideration, I beg leave to offer a few remarks on the general aspect of the question at issue. The present agitation against the Bill, as you are all aware, originated with a few planters in Bengal. If they had stood alone unbacked, and unsupported, their agitation would have died away without leaving behind the faintest trace of its existence. (Cheers.) Unfortunately, however, it has been made a common cause by the European community generally, and the result was the boisterous and unpatriotic meeting in the Town Hall of Calcutta. (Loud applause.) Now, gentlemen, all the opposition to this Bill is based on arguments which, when dropped into the crucible of analysis, appear alike sentimental, illogical and untenable. (Hear, hear.) We will here examine a few of them, and see first, how, in the absence of better and sounder reasons, the opponents have taken refuge in the stock argument of the "cherished and privileged rights of Britons." (Loud applause.) If it had been really and intrinsically a valued right involving no injury to the interests of the other and by far the larger portion of Her Majesty's subjects, we should have respected it with all our hearts. (Applause.) But when this alleged vested birth-right comes to be asserted irrespective of, and without regard to, the injustice which it inflicts on the other races, one cannot help losing patience at the boldness of this claim. (Hear, hear.) And what, may I ask, becomes of this right, the so-called birth-right in the Presidency-towns? If a "cherished birth-right," why has it been waived there? And has this waiver led to any serious evil consequences to the European community in the Presidency-towns? ("No," and applause.) This gives rise to another question. Was any opposition then made? If made, how did it become powerless? If not, why was the "cherished birth-right" not then thought of? But under whatever circumstances it was abandoned in the Presidency-towns, the fact remains that already in more places than one has this privilege been given up,—and this takes away from it the essentially "cherished" character with which it is now sought to invest it. Gentlemen, the removal of this privilege in the Presidency-towns is no uncertain indication of the ultimate fate of the present agitation (cheers); and well had it been for India, if the Anglo-Indians of our own day, profiting by the wholesome experience of the past, had paused, before attempting to disturb by their ill-timed agitation, the harmony which was being slowly but steadily developed between Europeans and Natives all over the land. (Applause.) Now, the privilege which we are asked to look upon as a "cherished" privilege was originally merely a temporary and a permissive privilege conceded to British-born subjects under the exceptional circumstances of a newly subjugated and half-civilized country, and in the absence of competent Natives eligible for higher posts in the administration of justice. (Cheers.) But times have changed. The consolidation of the Indian Empire is now an accomplished fact, and thanks to the benign policy of the British Government, the India of to-day is not what it was even half a century ago. (Applause.) We have now Native gentlemen quite prepared to undergo any inconveniences and privations to compete in intellectual accomplishments with Englishmen in the very land of their birth. (Cheers.) We have now Native gentlemen educated in India, quite able to vie successfully with Englishmen in every department of Her Majesty's service, which calls for the exercise of high intellectual powers. (Renewed cheers.) Now, it must be remembered that it is on men of this high mental calibre, who in addition are also the tried and trusted officials of the British Government, and who by their capacity and long and varied experience in the judicial line have gradually risen and reached the top of the graded ladder, that this extended jurisdiction is intended to be conferred. (Hear, hear, and applause.) But no! the oppositionists will have none of these, not even the picked flower of the land, and men with high accomplishments and undoubted credentials are set down as incapable of trying offences, how trivial soever, committed by Europeans. This, gentlemen, is a libel. (Applause.) It is a libel on the education imparted in England, it is a libel on the education received by Native youths in India. And although we have not, so far, a fair share of the Native element in either of the services, covenanted or uncovenanted, yet the honourable and the unimpeachable manner in which those who have the good fortune to belong to them have been known to discharge the responsible functions of their respective offices; this, I say, gives a conclusive answer to such ungenerous and baseless insinuations. (Applause.) Equally unfounded and uncharitable is the attack, that Native Magistrates are liable to be influenced in the trial of Europeans by race prejudices. As a matter of fact, Native officials generally are and must, in the nature of things, be exceedingly cautious and circumspect in dealing with civil and even more with criminal cases in which Europeans are concerned. And if they err at all, the error in the majority of cases will be found to indicate a leaning in favour of the European. (Hear, hear.) Probably the leaders of the anti-jurisdiction movement who are now opposing the Bill, tooth and nail, may yet find to their utter chagrin and disappointment, when the Bill passes into law, which sooner or later it is destined to despite their antagonistic attitude, that European offenders will practically not object to be tried by calm, sedate, and experienced Native Magistrates. (Cheers.) It is also suggested that the Natives in the mufassal will, by virtue of this Bill, keep concocting conspiracies against Europeans. If it was not for the gravity with which such an argument is advanced, one would be tempted to treat it with silent contempt. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, such fears are absolutely chimerical and only serve to show the excited state of the mind which conceives them. I say it is monstrous to suppose that the poor, helpless people of the mufassal to whom the bare earning of a meagre livelihood is an effort they can scarcely cope with, will be able, even if they could dare, to indulge in the idle and costly luxury of false prosecutions against Europeans, who, when they are true and good, are almost worshipped and identified with Sircar and Ma-bap by these people in the mufassal. (Hear, hear.) But assuming for the sake of argument that any such cases did arise, have not the Europeans the advantages of the higher intelligence, the greater capacity of co-operation, all the facilities of the railway and the telegraph, and the voice of the public press in their favour, wherewith to counteract the effects of such a conspiracy? (Applause.) Now, another stock argument advanced with some stress by the oppositionists is that the time has not yet come for the introduction of this measure. Gentlemen, I can conceive of no argument more fatal to their cause than this. It is an irony of fate that when one has to defend a feeble cause one is unconsciously led into the use of arguments which cuts the ground from under one's feet. (Hear, hear.) Now what does the argument really mean?—this argument that the time and the imperative necessity for conferring this right on the Natives of India have not yet arrived? Does it not mean by implication that the much talked-of "cherished right" will vanish, and with it all objections to the Bill, when the necessity for its introduction asserts itself with overwhelming force? Does it not show a lamentable weakness on the part of the oppositionists to admit that a time will come when they will not be able to breathe the faintest murmur against this dreaded Bill? And is it not short-sighted policy, the policy of men but imperfectly schooled in the political academy, to oppose a measure for the poor satisfaction of shelving it when they feel sure that the unseen future may render it practicable any day? (Applause.) Let these gentlemen realise the invincible truths laid down by Mr. Wordsworth in his memorable letters to the Bombay Gazette. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) Gentlemen, I will here take the liberty to quote a sentence from one of these letters as directly bearing on the point I am just discussing. Mr. Wordsworth says:—"The real test of statesmanship is surely the capacity to foresee difficulties and emergencies and to divert and neutralise them by timely legislation." (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, the doctrine enunciated in this sentence is aptly illustrated by the native adage which upbraids the folly of procrastination and points out the unwisdom of setting about digging a well when the house is on fire. (Laughter.) Now, statesmen of the school of Sir FitzJames Stephen, whose extreme Conservatism is only another name for habitual coldness to all that means the true progress of India, inculcate the doctrine that India must be treated as a conquered country and governed by force. It is useless at this time of the day, and in an age of progress and enlightenment, to battle with a retrograde argument of this character. (Applause.) I would only refer such thinkers to the history of their own country, and hope they may take warning from the bitter experiences of the past. Men of this stamp are not only the enemies of Indian progress, but they may truly be declared as the enemies of England herself. Let them realize the declared principle and policy of just and equal administration without distinction of caste, creed or colour, vouchsafed to India, by Royal Proclamation, and rise to a correct appreciation of the growing necessities of this country. (Applause.) Let them sit at the feet of political thinkers like John Bright—(loud applause)—and learn that the only way to govern India is to govern it through the affections of its people. (Applause.) Gentlemen, I will not linger more on this subject, although the justness of one's cause inspires one with ardour. (Hear, hear.) Let us have implicit faith in the benign and generous policy of the English nation, whose noble instincts of justice and liberality will surely rise above the level of those Anglo-Indians who advocate a more or less narrow and short-sighted policy. (Applause.) Let us have full confidence in the Liberal House of Commons. (Applause.) Let us have unbounded confidence in every righteous Englishman, who is true to himself and to his country, and who, adapting the well-known Latin exclamation to himself, can fittingly say, "Anglicus civis sum." (Loud and continued applause.)

Mr. Kassinath Trimbeck Telang, who was received with loud cheers, said—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen,—The resolution which has been entrusted to me runs as follows:—"That the Committee of the Bombay Branch of the East India Association be also requested to take steps to have the memorial, with the necessary alterations, forwarded to the Honourable the House of Commons in England." In proposing this resolution, it would be wrong, on more than one ground, if I were to detain you with any lengthy speech of my own at this late hour, and especially after the able speeches which have been addressed to you. But the subject which we are met to consider to-night is one of such great importance that I trust the meeting will bear with me while I make a few remarks on it. I do not propose to travel over the ground occupied so well by the speeches of Mr. Budroodin and Mr. Pheroza and the speakers who followed them. Nor, for obvious reasons, shall I say anything about the recent doings of our European friends in the Town Hall of Calcutta. These doings were of such a nature that, to borrow the language used on a celebrated occasion by a distinguished man now no more, the best rebuke we can administer to these gentlemen is to refrain from following so dangerous an example. (Cheers.) There was, however, one point, gentlemen, made, I believe, at the Calcutta Town Hall, and certainly made in the public press since, to which I feel bound to refer. It has been asserted that the Bengalis entertain feelings of hatred and hostility to the British nation. Well, gentlemen, having had the honour, as you are aware, of being appointed to serve on the Education Commission, I had recently to spend a few months in Calcutta. And during the period of my stay there I came into close, intimate, and frequent contact with the leaders of thought and the leaders in public affairs of the Bengali nation. And having frequently had frank conversations with many of them, having thus seen them in a sort of mental undress, so to speak, I venture to affirm, and to affirm very confidently, that this hatred and hostility is a mere figment of some alarmist brain, and has no existence in reality. (Loud cheers.) I think that, believing this, as I do believe it, to be the truth upon the subject, I am bound, if not by any other obligation, at least by gratitude for the kindness which I received from my Bengali brethren while I was among them, to make this statement to correct misapprehension. I need not, however, dwell any further on this point, and therefore I shall turn at once to the main subject to which I wish to address myself. As I have said, I do not intend now to go into any of the positive arguments in favour of the Jurisdiction Bill. But I propose to examine the main points made by an eminent man, Sir FitzJames Stephen, in his letter on the subject. Sir FitzJames Stephen has held high office in this country, and now occupies a distinguished position on the English Bench. He is not only a lawyer, but a writer on Jurisprudence and a political philosopher who has thought out the ultimate principles of the political creed which he holds. (Hear, hear.) And, therefore, I need not say that his authority on such a subject as ours is very high, and I should be the first in ordinary circumstances to defer to it, but in this case I must say that if I was an opponent of the Jurisdiction Bill, I should be afraid of Sir FitzJames Stephen's championship. Many years ago he wrote a work entitled "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" which, I think, may with substantial accuracy be characterised as the gospel of force. (Cheers.) In that work he set himself in obtrusive antagonism to the doctrines of modern liberalism, by which I do not mean what is called by that name in the jargon of English party politics, but I mean liberalism in the broader and higher sense, as signifying those political principles, which, for us here in India, are embodied in the great Proclamation of 1858. Well, as he holds those opinions it is plain that even his support, if he supported any measure of Government which involved any of those principles, would be an occasion of embarrassment. But apart from these general considerations, let us see for an instant what Sir FitzJames Stephen does say. His first proposition, not first in order in his letter, but first in importance, is that the policy of Lord Ripon's Government is shifting the foundations of British power in this country or, to use his own expression, is inconsistent with the foundations on which British power rests. Now, I deny this entirely. I say that the principles of Lord Ripon's administration, as pointed out in our memorial, are in consonance with the long established principles of the British Government as laid down by Parliament and the Crown. (Loud cheers.) And I say, further, that those principles are in accord with the lessons to be derived from the study of past history. I remember being struck many years ago, in reading the history of the Romans under the Empire, with a passage in which the author said that one great lesson to be deduced from the history of Rome was that all conquering nations, in order to render their government in the conquered countries stable and permanent, must divest themselves of their peculiar privileges by sharing them with the conquered peoples. Now, gentlemen, we all know that it is the proud and just boast of Englishmen that they are the Romans of the modern world, and that the British Empire is in modern days what the Roman Empire was in ancient times. If so, are we wrong, are we unreasonable in asking that the lessons of Roman history, and, as Mr. Merivale points out, the lessons of the history of other ancient governments also, should be adopted by our British rulers? (Cheers.) Is it not quite proper and reasonable for us to ask that the countrymen of Clarkson and Wilberforce, of Gladstone and John Bright—(loud cheers)—should not only adopt those lessons but improve upon them, and rise superior to the countrymen of Marius and Sylla, the Triumvirs and the Cæsars? I venture to say, gentlemen, that if Britons are now content to fail to carry out those lessons, and to fall short of the generosity of the Romans, it will be regarded as not creditable to them by the future historian. And as a loyal subject of the British Government I should be sorry for such a result. (Loud and prolonged cheers.) We next come to Sir FitzJames Stephen's second point. He says—Oh! it is all very well to ask for the abolition of these special privileges of Europeans, but every other section of the Indian community has its own privileges which the law recognises. And he gives as an instance the fact that Hindus, Mahomedans, &c., have their own special laws of inheritance administered to them. Now, I venture to say that no fair comparison can be made between laws of inheritance and laws of criminal procedure. The former does not affect any one save the special community to which it is administered. What does it matter to John Jones whether the property of Rama, or Ahmed, Muncherjee goes on his death to his sons or his daughters, his father or mother or widow? But a law of criminal procedure, as has been already pointed out by other speakers, affects the other communities in a most important respect. It is plain, therefore, that the two cases which Sir FitzJames Stephen treats as identical, are really distinguishable on essential points. Besides, it must be remembered that no other class privileges are recognised in the criminal law of British India; it is only in the civil law that they are so recognised. But, further, I am surprised at Sir FitzJames Stephen not alluding in his letter to one point relevant to this branch of the subject to which reference is made in his own volume already referred to. He has there pointed out that the British Government in India is, involuntarily it may be, but still actually, interfering with the personal laws of natives, even in matters connected with their religious beliefs, and is applying, as Sir FitzJames Stephen puts it, a constant and steady pressure to adapt them to modern civilization—so that the Government, as Sir FitzJames Stephen himself puts it, is really heading a revolution. If then the Government is actually interfering with the personal laws of us unenlightened and uncivilized natives, is there anything wrong in their interfering with those of the enlightened Britons, with whose views and opinions, feelings and wishes they are much more familiar, and in much greater sympathy? Is there anything unfair if we ask that the same measure should be dealt out to both? Sir FitzJames Stephen next refers to the special tribunals for Europeans maintained in Turkey and other countries. But there the European is protected from foreign courts to be subjected to British courts. Here he is protected from one class of British courts to be subjected to another. The difference is quite manifest between the two cases. Further, Sir FitzJames Stephen says it is only natural that everyone charged with a criminal offence should wish to be tried by one of his own race and colour. But this leads to a difficulty, namely, that natives may have a similar wish. And how does Sir FitzJames Stephen meet that? Why, he says that while no native understands English sufficiently to conduct a trial in that language properly attempts are made—mark the expression, attempts are made—to get European officers to study the vernaculars of the country. Now, gentlemen, I think it is not egotistical to say that the first part of the statement is the reverse of the truth. (Cheers.) For every one European that can be shown competent to conduct a criminal trial in a vernacular language, we can show at least one hundred natives even more competent to do so in English. (Loud cheers.) And as to the second part, we have not to rely only on our personal experiences. As we say at Law habemus optimum testem confidentem reum. Many years ago a book was published by a Bengal Civilian, called “Life in the Mofussil,” in which he very candidly admitted that though he passed the examination in Bengali, he knew little or nothing of the language. (Loud laughter.) Here we have a test of the success of the attempt to which Sir FitzJames Stephen refers. I do not think, gentlemen, I need further detain you with Sir FitzJames Stephen’s arguments. His principal points have, I venture to say, been satisfactorily answered. There is, however, one argument to which I should like to refer before sitting down. It is put forward in the Times of India by a gentleman who signs himself “Maratha,” but whose nationality, from internal evidence, seems to be European and not Maratha. However, on the principle of measures, not men, we shall consider his argument as it deserves to be, whether it emanates from a veritable Maratha or not. He says natives are not fit and competent judges of Europeans, because the native papers are writing about the cases of deaths of natives at the hands of Europeans as if they were all cases of deliberate murder and the explanation of a ruptured spleen always untrue. He argues that as this view of the Native papers has not been disavowed by educated Natives, it indicates the state of their feelings towards Europeans, and renders them unfit judges for trying Europeans. Now, I am not one of those who believe that this explanation of the ruptured spleen is always untrue. (Laughter and applause.) I have no doubt that in many cases it is true, and that the language of many of our Native papers on the subject is exaggerated and without justification. But having admitted that, I do not admit the correctness of “Maratha’s” argument. I will not, however, analyse it now, but put another argument on the other side. We all know that many Europeans have spoken of the Native communities in a way which means that they consider us all as, on the whole, a people given to perjury. This opinion, publicly expressed by some members of the European community, has not been disavowed by others. And therefore, according to “Maratha’s” logic, the true conclusion to be derived from this is that Europeans are not fit judges for Natives. (Cheers.) This broad conclusion follows according to “Maratha’s” principles. Certainly, in cases where Natives are charged with perjury Europeans would be, on those principles, unfit judges. Because whereas, according to the presumption of English law, the accused would have to be treated as innocent until the contrary was proved, in the mind of the European judge the Native prisoner would be guilty until he proved the contrary. Mark, I don’t say this would be a correct result. But I say it follows if “Maratha’s” argument is sound, I use it only as an argumentum ad hominem. See then the deadlock. You cannot have European judges, and you cannot have Native judges. How then is the administration of justice to be secured? (Laughter and cheers.) I do not think, gentlemen, I ought now to detain you any longer. We have a very good case; let us take it before the House of Commons. It has been taken there already, in fact, by the opponents of the Bill. Let us place our view before the House. (Cheers.) By past experience we know that in such matters we can trust to the justice and sense of fair play of the British House of Commons. (Loud cheers.) Let us leave this matter also to their judgment, in the full confidence that it will be there decided on considerations free from all local passion and local prepossession. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Vijbhucandas Atmaram said—Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—The resolution which has been just read and submitted to you for adoption is one which would easily commend itself to the good sense of this meeting. In moving this resolution, I do not propose to address you any arguments touching the principle of the Bill for the Amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which is intended to confer upon a very few, tried, and efficient Native officials jurisdiction over European British-born subjects in criminal cases, because I feel that the previous speakers have ably and eloquently met, not only every possible objection that has hitherto been urged against this measure, but have, by incontrovertible facts and stern reasoning, established that it is a real necessity urgently called for to suit the exigencies of the improved and advanced circumstances of the country. At the time when the Government of India was taken over directly by Her Most Gracious Majesty the Empress of India, a solemn pledge was given to the unrepresented millions of this land, that the government of this country would be carried on without any distinction of creed or colour. The Proclamation then made forms the charter of our rights and liberties, and I say that the present Bill is one of the numerous other measures which are required to be carried out in order to secure for the Natives of this country the full benefit and enjoyment of the rights and privileges vouchsafed to them by the highest authority in the realm. As it is getting late, and you are impatient to leave this hot room, I will conclude by saying, in the words of Edmund Burke, “that the House of Commons will have another and a very different duty to perform on this occasion. They will be bound not to suffer public opinion, which often prevents judgment and often defeats its effects, to be debauched and corrupted. Whenever the public mind is misled it becomes the duty of the Commons of Great Britain to give it a more proper tone and a juster way of thinking.” This sacred and responsible duty the Commons of Great Britain will, we all trust and hope, fully and effectually discharge, if necessary, in the present case with regard to their countrymen in this land. With these remarks, gentlemen, I beg to second the adoption of the resolution.

On the motion of Mr. Lukhimadas Khinjee, seconded by Mr. Jairaj Peerbhoy, the meeting unanimously voted thanks to the Sheriff of Bombay for convening the meeting.

Mr. Dadabhoy Nowrojee,—who was received with loud and prolonged cheers and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, said,—Gentlemen, you must not expect a speech from me. (Loud cheers.) You have heard all that could be said from the previous speakers, who have treated the subject ably and exhaustively. My proposition now is simply this, that the Honourable Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy has presided to-day with so much ability that I think we ought to pass a cordial vote of thanks for his able conduct in the chair. (Loud cheers.)

The Honourable Rao Sahib V. N. Maudlik—According to the usage of public meetings, as my friend, the Chairman, cannot put this proposition before you, I beg with your kind indulgence to do the same.

The proposition was then carried with acclamation.

To the Most Honourable the Marquis of Ripon, K.G., P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The humble Memorial of the Committee of the Branch Indian Association at Kalna, in the District of Burdwan—

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—1st.—That your Excellency’s humble petitioners are deeply grateful to your Excellency for the warm interest your Excellency takes in the real welfare of the Natives of this country. Guided by the noble principle not to rule this vast Empire of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India by the sword, your Excellency has condescended to carry out strictly and literally the golden words of Her Imperial Majesty’s Proclamation of 1858.

2nd.—That your memorialists cannot but thank you most cordially for your Excellency’s most purely disinterested and highly laudable endeavours to destroy the invidious distinction between Natives and Europeans in the trial of criminal cases.

3rd.—That your memorialists most warmly and sincerely support the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill which your noble Excellency has recently introduced into the Council of the Governor General for making laws and regulations. They consider the above Bill as a just, wise and righteous measure, calculated to remove a growing administrative inconvenience.

4th.—That your memorialists beg most emphatically to contradict the totally unfounded and wrong statement of the opponents of the measure that the Natives of this country do not crave for the boon your Excellency intends to confer upon them. They deem such a law as indispensably urgent, and sanguinely pray that your Excellency will pass it in due course.

5th.—That your Excellency’s memorialists are fully convinced that, by the light of the education vouchsafed to the Natives of this country by the benign Government of Her Majesty, many among them have become well qualified to hold the most honourable and responsible situations of the State. Some of them have, by their education, probity and capacity, been deemed worthy to occupy seats on the Bench of the highest tribunals in India.

6th.—That your Excellency's memorialists feel proud of those selected Natives who have acquitted themselves honourably in open and hard competition in England at the Covenanted Civil Service Examination and, after successfully passing through the ordeal, have been fortunate to enter that service of which the most onerous duties they are discharging most creditably.

7th.—Your memorialists therefore most respectfully pray that your Excellency will be pleased to pass the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill into law, and they earnestly hope that the Almighty God will help your Excellency in the above noble act.

And your Excellency's petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

In the name of the Branch Indian Association, Kalna—

Dated 19th May, 1883.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council.

The humble Memorial of the Sadharan Hita Shadhini
Sabha of Tarash, in the District of Pubna, Bengal—

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists regard with feelings of deep satisfaction and thankfulness the proposed amendment to the Criminal Procedure Code to remove the invidious distinction of race, religion or colour in the trial of European British subjects in criminal cases.

That your memorialists are in full conviction that it is the noble principle of the British jurisprudence and polity to put aside all distinction in the eye of law which is the just pride of the British Government in India.

That, being assured of your Excellency's wise and liberal policy and of noble principles which actuate your Excellency in the government of this country, your memorialists are confident that the proposed amendment to the Criminal Procedure Code will come to effect with the entire satisfaction and heartfelt gratitude of the Natives of India.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The humble petition of Her Majesty's European British subjects in Southern India—

SHEWETH,—That your memorialists are British-born subjects of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India, residing in that part of British India which is subject to the Governor and Council of the Presidency of Fort St. George and its Dependencies, and possess by right of birth all the liberties of English freemen in the constitutional relations of the subject to the Crown.

2. That amongst the most ancient and most cherished liberties of Englishmen is the privilege reserved to them by Magna Charta, that the Sovereign shall not exercise judicial authority over a freeman of England "nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terrae."

3. That your memorialists are entitled to the full benefit of these hereditary privileges, of which the accident of their residence in India should not in any way be permitted to deprive them.

4. That, from the date of the establishment of the British power in India, your memorialists have enjoyed these privileges; inasmuch as, by the laws in force in India, no European British subject could be arraigned for any offence whatsoever save before a Justice of the Peace (himself a British subject), nor could a British subject be tried for any offence involving any greater punishment than a fine before any tribunal except a Judge of the High Court and jury of his fellow-citizens in the Presidency-towns.

5. That, in the year 1869, an Act was passed by the Legislative Council of India authorising the various Local Governments to appoint "any persons" to act as Justices of the Peace within the towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay; and that, under this Act, certain Natives have, since that year, been appointed Magistrates of Police and Justices of the Peace within the three Presidency-towns, and have exercised jurisdiction over European British subjects, but only within the local limits of the said towns.

6. That a Bill has now been introduced into the Supreme Legislative Council of India, the object of which is to extend jurisdiction over European British subjects residing in India, to all District Magistrates and Sessions Judges and certain other Magistrates of the 1st class, whether European or Native, and in any part of the country.

7. Your memorialists submit that the existence of Native Magistrates possessing jurisdiction over Europeans within the Presidency-towns affords no valid argument in favour of the extension of this jurisdiction to Native Magistrates in the Mufassal. The Presidency Magistrate exercises his functions in the midst of a numerous and vigilant European population, by whom any mistake on his part would be instantly detected. His Court is frequented by the reporters of the daily Press. It is thronged with legal practitioners, and a European Magistrate sits in the adjoining room. All these conditions would be wanting in the case of a Native Magistrate exercising jurisdiction over a European in the Mufassal.

8. That your memorialists are justified by the past in fearing that the infringement of their hereditary rights, now contemplated, cannot long remain limited to the class of Magistrates to whom it is now proposed to entrust enlarged powers. The same reason which has been adduced as necessitating the grant of jurisdiction over European British subjects to Native Magistrates of the 1st class can equally, and your memorialists doubt not will in time, if this Bill be passed, be applied to all classes of Magistrates; and similar arguments will be urged for an extension of the jurisdiction thus granted to Native Magistrates, until it may come to pass that Europeans may hereafter find themselves subject to the penalty of death at the hands of a Native Sessions Judge in the Mufassal.

9. That the only reason adduced for depriving your memorialists of their hereditary right of being tried by one of their own race is that this privilege constitutes an invidious distinction between European and Native British subjects. It is admitted that, in practice, the privilege has not operated to the prejudice of the administration of justice throughout the Indian empire.

10. That your memorialists regard with anxiety and alarm this attempt to deprive them of rights which they and their predecessors in this country have enjoyed since the foundation of British rule in India.

11. That the existing distinction between European and Native British subjects, which is now termed invidious, is entirely consonant with the invariable custom of the British Government to recognise and respect all the peculiar privileges and customs of the numerous different races which compose the population of this empire. Your memorialists may be allowed to cite, as one example, the privilege accorded to that section of the population which preserves the custom of secluding its female members from appearance in public. In their case, the Government has provided that such female members shall be exempted from the ordinary processes of law which secure the attendance of any member of the community to give evidence in Courts of Justice. Your memorialists may further cite the special privileges conceded to Brahmans when subjected to imprisonment in the jails of the country. In order to preserve their caste-privileges, such Brahmans are allowed special arrangements for the preparation of their food, and for other observances connected with their caste customs, and are further exempted from such forms of labour as would be contrary to their caste-prejudices; although the offences for which they have been sentenced may be of a class for which the law has provided the penalty of imprisonment with hard labour as ordinarily exacted. Such concessions, of which many other instances could be given, are manifestly a recognition of distinctions between one class of the population and another.

12. Your memorialists therefore contend that, in claiming for European British subjects the continuance of the special privilege of being tried by men of their own race, they ask no more than is daily conceded in various ways to other races in India; and therefore that the charge of invidiousness is not fairly applicable to the distinction which your memorialists seek to preserve. So long as differences of race and social customs are recognised and observed by the Government of India, your memorialists may fairly claim that this special privilege, to which their class attaches peculiar importance, should, in equity, be also observed.

13. That your memorialists have further good reason for deprecating the proposed alteration in the law. Your memorialists are most anxious to avoid any remarks which may appear to disparage the capacity or integrity of their Native fellow-subjects; but it is impossible to overlook the fact that the social customs and the domestic life of Natives of India are widely dissimilar from those of Europeans; that few natives, especially in the Mufassal, can have any opportunity of assimilating European forms of thought, or of acquiring any accurate idea of the customs and daily life of Englishmen, and their powers of observation, examination and judgment must be in great measure influenced by the customs and prejudices of their special castes; and that, for these and many other reasons, the Native cannot be held to possess such common interest with the European as is contemplated by the legal maxim that an Englishman is entitled to trial by the judgment "parium suorum," and is therefore unfitted to exercise judicial authority over the Englishman.

14. Your memorialists would further point out that, owing to the presence of numerous missionaries scattered throughout Southern India, some, and possibly many of the cases affecting Europeans, which, if the proposed Bill become law, will fall to be tried by Native Magistrates, must be cases concerning to a greater or less extent the religious prejudices of the Natives. They submit that it would be a very doubtful boon to any Native Magistrate to require him to try a case in which he cannot be a disinterested arbiter; where, even if he can succeed in divesting himself of the prejudices of hereditary descent, early training and daily custom, he must be aware that, if his honest decision be opposed to the social prejudices of his caste-fellows, his verdict will inevitably imperil his social comfort for the rest of his life.

15. Your memorialists are also reluctantly compelled to refer to the very prevalent custom in India of preferring false charges. No Judge who has ever sat upon the Bench in India will deny that false charges and false evidence are matters of daily occurrence in Indian Courts. Your memorialists cannot but fear that to deprive them of the right of being tried by their countrymen will be but an invitation to the ill-disposed to practise against Europeans the same custom of malicious accusation which the Natives of this country so commonly practise against each other. Even under the existing law such cases have occurred, and charges affecting the lives of Englishmen have only broken down under the searching investigation of an English Bench and an English Bar.

16. That, although the numerical strength of your memorialists is not great when compared with the teeming masses of the other races in British India, it yet remains an undisputed fact that your memorialists represent, almost exclusively, the most progressive arts and manufactures in Southern India, as well as a very large proportion of the capital employed in commerce, planting and other industries.

17. That the removal of the prerogative of race would also remove the principal source of the confidence with which European British subjects have acted as pioneers of civilization, and braved the dangers of a residence in outlying regions, where they were either altogether isolated or members of a numerically feeble community.

With the destruction of the bulwark of their liberty, the subordinate ranks of European British subjects in India will no longer be prepared to run the risks of residence in lonely places, where they, their wives and their children, will labour under all the disadvantages of the alien, without the one compensating advantage which they have hitherto enjoyed.

18. That the inevitable consequence of such a change in the condition of European subordinate employes in India will be the withdrawal from the empire of much European capital and a severe check to the progress of the material prosperity of the empire.

Your memorialists therefore pray—

- (1) That this their memorial may be received.
- (2) That your memorialists may not be deprived of any of the liberties enjoyed by English free men under Magna Charta.
- (3) That, if uniformity of legislation be considered so great a necessity, such uniformity may be attained by repealing the anomaly created by Act II of 1869, whereby the appointment of Natives to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans in the presidency-towns is authorised.
- (4) That the progress of reform in India and the improvement and development of her resources may not be impeded and jeopardised by proposals for legislation of a character calculated to create antagonism of races, or by sudden and subversive changes in the laws.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

No. 45, dated 26th May, 1883.

From—The PRESIDENT, HITCHINTAK SARHA, Vingorla,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I have the honour to forward a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council from the Native inhabitants of Vingorla in favour of the Jurisdiction Bill, and request you to place it before His Excellency in Council.

No. 44, dated 13th May 1883.

To His Excellency the Right Honourable George Frederick Samuel, Marquis of Ripon, K.G., P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., Viceroy and Governor General of India.

Memorial of Native Inhabitants of Vingorla.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—We, the undersigned humble petitioners, Native inhabitants of Vingorla, Bombay Presidency, have the honour to submit the following few lines to Your Excellency's attention, in the hope of getting what we pray for therein.

We humbly trust Your Excellency in Council will pass the Jurisdiction Bill in the interest of the country which is introduced into Your Excellency's Legislative Council by Honourable Mr. Ilbert. This much-needed measure will not, we trust, be given up owing to the unfounded charge brought against Your Excellency's Government by the opponents. We are sure that Your Excellency, instead of yielding to misrepresentation, will remain steadfast to your purpose against all the opponents.

We are very much obliged to Your Excellency for governing the country wisely, impartially and in a manner to give happiness to us, the ever unfortunate Hindus. Ever since Your Excellency took up the reins of the Government of India this country has been advancing in peace and prosperity.

We are quite sure that Your Excellency's mind will not be prejudiced in respect to the Bill, though the opponents of the Bill bring serious charges against it. We know not the cause of some of the Europeans in India being soured against Your Excellency's administration. They attach that blame to Your Excellency, we think, from notions of their own superiority; that is to say, they cannot bear us to have authority over them, and so, for taking our side, they blame Your Excellency. We think that it would not be just to do away with this Bill now when it has obtained the public approval. Their very thoughts, expressed in some newspapers, tell us that their opposition only arises from mere self-interest. They are unmindful of others' good, and in particular of that of the Hindus, whom they think of no account at all. We don't think—and not only we, but none would think—that it would cause any harm to them to confer the right stated in that Bill upon qualified Hindu officers.

After all, we have nothing more to say than to entreat Your Excellency to go by the just way, and to carry that Bill into execution as soon as possible.

The British power in India must be founded on the affection and the gratitude of the people of the country. Whatever short-sighted and interested partisans, led away by ignorance and prejudice, may say to the contrary, there is no doubt that English statesmen, with acute political vision and foresight, recognise this fact, and honestly strive to adapt their policy to the altered condition of the country.

The above-stated assembly hopes warmly that this memorial shall be forwarded to Parliament.

For which act of kindness we shall, in duty bound, ever pray and oblige.

Hoping every success to Your Lordship's efforts.

In continuation of my letter No. 3232,* dated the 14th instant, I am directed to forward, * Printed as Papers No. 30.

for the information of the Government of India, the accompanying copy of a minute by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Latham, Acting Judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature at Bombay, dated the 21st idem, containing his opinion on the provisions of the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Minute by the Honourable Mr. JUSTICE LATHAM on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, dated 21st May, 1883.

If the matter on which our opinions are desired had been in the same position in which it was when I wrote my minute of last year, I should have been prepared to adhere entirely to the opinion expressed in that minute. That is, I should have thought it desirable to place all members of the Covenanted Civil Service, European or Native, on the same footing as regards their power of trying European British subjects, and should have entertained no objection to doing away with the special provisions of Chapter 33 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Unfortunately the matter is by no means in the same position as last year. The introduction of a Bill going beyond the proposals then laid before the Judges of this Court, and having an operation even wider in appearance than in fact, combined probably with circumstances not connected with this particular Bill, have created what I can only call a panic among the European British subjects who are the persons principally affected by the provisions of the Bill; and that panic has led to the use of violent language and the development of race animosity on the part of Europeans and Natives alike. At the present moment it is impossible to conceive of a more burning question to be dealt with by legislation; and yet it must be so dealt with, or the legislature appear to be overborne by popular clamour.

Now, while I have little sympathy with the panic and none with the passionate language and excited feelings which the Bill has occasioned, I feel that the existence of that panic and those feelings are matters which deserve the attention of the legislature. An improvement in criminal procedure may be too dearly bought at the price of placing the whole or a large part of the class who are the potential subjects of that procedure in opposition to the criminal law and the authorities who enact or administer it. And I should be disposed to confine the present alteration of the law within the narrowest limits compatible with the maintenance of the independence of the legislature and its refusal to yield to mere agitation. I would sacrifice some degree of ideal improvement to the more important object of preventing or minimising a conflict between the sentiments of an important section of the community and the provisions of the law.

The provisions of the Bill which, in my opinion, should at present become law, are—

- (1) Section 2, making Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ex-officio Justices of the Peace.
- (2) So much of Section 1 as allows the appointment of Native Members of the Covenanted Civil Service to be Justices of the Peace.

I should advise the remaining parts of the enabling provisions of the Bill to be dropped, excepting of course such alterations of the Code of Criminal Procedure as are necessary to give effect to (1) and (2).

With regard to the disabling provisions of the Bill, which have excited less attention but to me seem fully as important as its enabling provisions, I would urge their being dropped altogether. I can see no good reason why Government should deprive itself of the services of a class of Europeans who can satisfactorily discharge the duties of Justices of the Peace, and to whom the persons brought before them can have no objection. I think that the attainment of a certain amount of symmetry in a branch of law for the most part unsymmetrical is an utterly inadequate reason for so doing. And I am certain that the administrative inconvenience which will be hereafter caused by the loss of the services of Europeans not falling within the classes enumerated in Section 1 of the Bill will far outweigh the convenience to result from the gain of the services of such Natives as may be selected from those classes.

With regard to the two points suggested for our consideration by the Government of Bombay, I would say as follows: I cannot approve of giving the right to a European accused to claim a jury although the jury system may not have been introduced into the district in which his trial is held. Whilst I believe that an impartial jury presided over by a competent Judge is the very best tribunal for the trial of a criminal charge, I am convinced that a partizan jury is the very worst of such tribunals. The most scandalous trials on record, as the English State trials of the 17th century, and those during the Reign of Terror, were so tried. And I fear that in outlying districts of the mofussil, if the case tried were that of a European charged with an offence against a Native, the jury would be certain to be partizan, and not the less so because it would probably contain partizans on both sides. I must also disapprove of the proposal to constitute special Benches composed of a European and a Native Magistrate for the trial of European British subjects, as this would be to set up a new difference when the desire is to remove old differences; and there would also be danger of an outcry in case of disagreement between the members of the Bench so composed.

In conclusion, I would observe that over 14 years' experience as Counsel and Judge in India has convinced me that the real administrative inconvenience connected with the trial of European British subjects in the mofussil arises from the very restricted powers of punishment which the Sessions Judge has in such cases, and the consequent necessity for the transmission of accused and witnesses to the High Court in matters of no great importance. In the present excited state of feeling it would not be wise to attempt to deal with a subject yet untouched; but I think that at a calmer time this is the direction in which it is most important to modify the existing law.

No. 3731, dated 2nd June, 1883.

From—C. GONNE, Esq., Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

In continuation of my letter No. 3621, dated the 29th ultimo, I am directed to forward, for the information of the Government of India, the accompanying copy of a minute by the Hon'ble Sir Charles Sargent, Kt., Chief Justice of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature, Bombay, dated the 10th idem, containing his opinion on the provisions of the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Minute by the Honourable the Chief Justice (SIR CHARLES SARGENT, Kt.) on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, dated 10th May, 1883.

I entirely approve of the principle of the Bill under consideration. I think that the time has arrived when the disability of the Natives of India to exercise original jurisdiction over British-born subjects outside the Presidency towns, as declared in sections 443 and 444 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, ought to be removed. My reasons for arriving at that conclusion have been already stated by me in a minute addressed to the Government of Bombay in the course of last year, and I venture to repeat them on the present occasion:—

"I think the distinction in question, which is a highly invidious one, should be abolished. The only grounds, I apprehend, on which it has ever been sought to justify the withdrawal of Europeans from the jurisdiction of Native criminal tribunals are that it offends the feeling of a European, as a member of the governing race, to appear before a Native on a criminal charge, and that some regard is due to the pride of race: that their being amenable to Natives in criminal matters lowers Europeans in the eyes of the masses and weakens their authority, and, lastly, that a European is not likely to meet with justice at the hands of Native Magistrates and Judges. As the law pays no regard to these considerations in Presidency towns, where the Magistrates may be either Europeans or Natives, and indeed, in this town of Bombay, have been, since I have been in India, for the most part Natives, the real question seems to be, whether there are special circumstances in the case of a European residing in the mufassal which render it advisable to retain the distinction. Now that such may have existed in other periods of our Indian history, when the position of a European in the mufassal was a very isolated one, I can well believe, but at the present day, when owing to the speedy communication between the Presidency towns and all parts of the mufassal where Europeans are likely to be met with, the distinction between the mufassal and Presidency towns is fast disappearing for nearly all purposes, I cannot think there can be any sufficient reason for the distinction in question. As to fitness and legal attainments, the Native members of the Civil Service can surely compare favourably with the Native Magistrates in Presidency towns who too often have had no legal training whatever. And as to Europeans not having justice meted out to them by Native Magistrates or Judges, my experience of Presidency Magistrates would lead to quite the contrary conclusion."

Whilst entertaining this view as to the general question, I am fully sensible as to the necessity of confining the jurisdiction over British-born subjects to those Natives whose training and antecedents in the judicial service afford a guarantee of fitness, moral as well as intellectual, to deal with the somewhat delicate questions which may be expected to call for their decision.

The provisions of the Bill, so far as it depends on the written law, appear to me to adequately fulfil the above condition. If the Bill becomes law, only those Natives will be able to exercise the jurisdiction who being members of the Covenanted Civil Service or Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces or Cantonment Magistrates have been invested with the powers of a First Class Magistrate, and it ought to be impossible, if the local Governments exercise but ordinary care in their selection from this limited and select class, for any Native to be appointed who is not deserving of the confidence of the European community.

Dated 4th June, 1883.

From—G. M. BARTON, Esq., Secretary, Indian Tea Association,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I am desired to hand you, for the information of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council, the accompanying copies of the memorial of the Indian Tea Districts Association, London, to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India, with reference to the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

To the Right Honourable the Earl of Kimberley, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India, dated April, 1883.

The memorial of the Indian Tea Districts Association

SHEWETH,—That your memorialists, interested in the important and increasing tea-growing industry of India, giving employment to a large number of European managers and assistants, more or less dispersed and isolated in the interior of the country, view with alarm and distrust the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, by which, if passed, Europeans will be brought under the criminal jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Judges.

That this abrogation of a much valued privilege is not proposed in response to any demand on the part of the people of India, but would appear to be dictated by no higher political considerations than the removal of a seeming legislative anomaly, and a questionable addition to administrative convenience.

That no grounds of urgency have been shewn for the removal of this anomaly from a body of laws interlaced with social customs, literally bristling with anomalies and exemptions in favour of the Natives, just as the entire structure of our dominion and Government of India rests on anomalies and race-distinctions seemingly adverse to them, but in reality as indispensable to their welfare as to the continuance of our rule.

That the plea of administrative inconvenience of the law as it exists has been shewn by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and other high authorities, to be either entirely groundless or insignificant in comparison with the wider issues raised.

That the removal of what may seem an invidious race-distinction may commend itself to the advocates of the amendment as being logically consistent, and in harmony with a policy of conciliation and encouragement of the Native races; but logical consistency in this sense, if rigidly followed, would lead to the abdication of our position as the governing race; and there is undeniably a wide field open for the exercise of such a policy without the surrender of the vital principle involved in this amendment,—a surrender emphatically condemned by an overwhelming consensus of enlightened opinion as being premature and dangerous.

That many of your memorialists have spent the best years of their lives in India, some of them in high administrative positions in the service of the Government, others in commercial and industrial pursuits, and have thus had ample opportunities of judging whether such a law as that now proposed, if passed, will tend to a more impartial and effectual administration of justice.

That while not denying to the Natives of India the possession of many excellent characteristics, your memorialists consider that, in their present stage of social and moral development, it would be unsafe and impolitic to entrust them with the power of exercising criminal jurisdiction over Europeans.

That while it has been said by the advocates of the measure that it would be applied tentatively and under certain tests, educational and otherwise, there can be little doubt that all such tests would prove more or less illusory, and that sooner or later the functions would come to be exercised by any and all Natives occupying the position of Magistrate or Judge.

That the fact of such precautions being deemed necessary is a tacit admission of the danger attending this legislative experiment, and of the uncertain ground on which the Government is venturing.

That only those who have resided long enough in the interior of India to become acquainted with the peculiarities of the Native character can understand the facility, and apparent completeness, with which a trumped-up criminal charge, dictated by motives of malice or greed, could be brought against a European, isolated from his countrymen, without the safeguards of the Bar, the Press and an educated public opinion, and having only Natives to rely upon for support and legal assistance. The issues involved in such a case are momentous,—no less so than the personal liberty and honour of the man or woman, as the case may be; and to the man the probable shipwreck of his career in life, and serious if not irremediable, injury to valuable interests dependent on his personal supervision; to the woman a degradation, the possible nature and scope of which can be readily conceived by any one conversant with the habits and customs of the East.

That the tribunal trying such a case would require not only to be such as to command confidence in its technical ability and integrity, but also to be sufficiently in sympathy with the race and class of the person on trial to be able to discern the inherent probability of guilt or innocence. It is in this respect that a Native Judge, who might be otherwise of unimpeachable fitness, would be most likely to fail; and, in fact, Europeans whose conduct has brought them fairly within the action of the Criminal Court will be as likely to escape the just penalty of their guilt as the innocent to incur an unmerited punishment.

That the grave objections, moral and material, to this measure may be summed up as follows:—

1. A revival of race-jealousy and further mutual alienation of the interests and sympathies of the European and Native elements of the population.
2. An increased temptation to resort to false and vexatious charges against Europeans, with consequent danger to their liberty and property.
3. A check to the influx of European capital, and to the expansion of commercial and industrial enterprise, arising from the absence of the essential conditions of security.
4. A consequent prejudicial effect on the general prosperity of the country and the revenues of the State.

Under this aspect of the question we may be allowed to refer to the immense impetus that has been given in recent years to the prosperity of India by means of European capital and enterprise.

The tea-industry of India alone represents an investment of capital of not less than fifteen millions sterling, and an annual disbursement, in wages and otherwise, in connection with the investment, of about two and a half millions sterling. The revenues derived from the various provinces and districts in which the industry is prosecuted show a marked and progressive increase, clearly denoting the operation of cause and effect. This is but an example of what is taking place with various degrees of industrial activity throughout the country, and it is obviously the interest of Government to foster by every legitimate means a spirit of private enterprise so well calculated to promote these objects, and to refrain from legislation which would have a deterrent effect.

Your memorialists therefore pray that your Lordship will be pleased to withhold your assent to a Bill, not shown to be required in the abstract interests of justice, which will be otherwise highly injurious in its operation and is opposed and deprecated by those who would be amenable to its incidence with a manifestation of public feeling and unanimity which it would be unwise to ignore, and which should alone suffice to induce the withdrawal of the measure.

And your Memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Dated 26th May, 1883.

From—R. M. DALZELL, Esq., Proprietor, Dumlote Tea Estate, Kumaon,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

I have the honour to enclose, for presentation to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, the accompanying memorial of the tea-planters and landed proprietors, residents in Kumaon and Garhwal, North-West Provinces of India.

To His Excellency the Most Noble the Marquis of Ripon, K.G., P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The memorial of the undersigned Tea-planters, Landowners and Residents, in Kumaon and Garhwal, North-West Provinces of India

SHEWETH,—That in the matter of the Bill now before the Legislative Council of the Government of India, entitled the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Act, they consider it is uncalled for and unnecessary for the following reasons:—

- 1st.—Because it is in direct antagonism to the wishes and desires of those most interested in it, namely, the great body of the British residents in India.
- 2nd.—It is calculated still further to widen the undesirable breach that already exists between the Christian and heathen subjects of Her Majesty the Queen and Empress of India.

3rd.—In the opinion of your memorialists, such legislative measures, having for their object the further extension of Native jurisdiction in this country, will, if thoroughly tested by the voice of the Natives themselves, be found contrary to the wishes of the bulk of the inhabitants of India, who, so far from desiring an increase of Native officials or of Native jurisdiction over Europeans in the administration of law and justice, would hail with heartfelt satisfaction an increase of British officials in the said administration of law and justice; and this your memorialists believe would be abundantly verified by an appeal to the Natives of India themselves.

4th.—Your memorialists beg therefore most respectfully to urge that the said Bill, the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Act, may not be passed into law.

To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 2261, dated 2nd April, 1883, forwarding copies of a letter from the Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department, No. 24C., dated the 17th March, 1883, and of a Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons which accompanied it, and requesting that Government might be favoured with the opinion of the Millowners Association on the provisions of the Bill.

These documents were submitted to a general meeting of the Association held on the 9th instant, when the following resolution was carried, the only Europeans (two) who were present, and who were members of the same firm, dissenting :—

I am directed to submit the accompanying copy of a letter, No. 68, dated the 22nd ultimo, from the Honorary Secretaries, European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association, and its enclosure, in original, being a protest from the non-official European residents of the districts of Jessore, Nuddea, and Pubna against the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Indian Defence Association,

To—The Officiating Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

We are directed by the Council of the above Association to forward herewith, in original, a protest from the non-official European residents in the districts of Jessore, Nuddea and Pubna, in Lower Bengal, on the subject of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, and to request that you will forward it through the proper channel to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

Protest from the Non-official European Residents in the Districts of Jessore, Nuddea and Pubna, Lower Bengal.

We, the undersigned non-official European residents in the districts of Jessore, Nuddea and Pubna, hereby give our most emphatic protest against the proposed change in the Criminal Procedure Code, whereby we are to lose the privileges we have hitherto enjoyed, and are to be made amenable to the jurisdiction of Natives. That we view any such change with the greatest anxiety and alarm, knowing, as we do, the great dangers which such might lead to; and, in districts like these, where Europeans are so isolated and so few in number, we consider it specially dangerous and fraught with ruin for us in every way. We resolve that one of our number should forward this our firm and indignant protest to the Commissioner of the Presidency Division, with the request that he will bring the same through the proper channel before His Excellency the Viceroy, in the assurance that Lord Ripon will not permit those privileges which we cherish so much, that (sic.) of being tried by our peers, to be taken from us.

From—C. GONNE, Esq., Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

In continuation of my letter No. 3855, dated the 5th instant, I am directed to forward, for the information of the Government of India, copy of a minute by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Nánábhái Haridás, Acting Judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature, Bombay, containing his opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Minute by the Honourable Mr. Justice NÁNÁBHAI HARIDÁS on the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of Jurisdiction over European British subjects, dated 2nd June, 1883.

I am unable to agree with the Acting Chief Justice in his opinion on this Bill. He denies "that a Native Judge or Magistrate in the mofussil, whether a Civil Servant or not, is fit to try a European British subject."

2. In considering this matter one must not overlook existing facts. Every such Judge or Magistrate in the mofussil already has power to try Frenchmen, Germans, Italians, Greeks, Russians—in short all Europeans, except those who are British subjects. For years he has exercised it in a perfectly satisfactory manner. I am not aware of any instances in which he has shown his incompetence in the exercise of it. In principle what difference is there between the two classes of Europeans that renders such a Judge or Magistrate competent to try one of them, and at the same time incompetent to try the other? Besides, Native Magistrates in the Presidency-towns have for years possessed the power of trying both classes of European offenders. If competent to exercise such power in the Presidency-towns, it is difficult to see how they become incompetent when transferred to the mofussil, and competent again when re-transferred to the Presidency-towns. The present state of the law on this subject is utterly indefensible. A Judge's fitness for his post does not depend in the least upon the colour of his skin or upon the nationality of the prisoner to be tried, or upon the place where the Court is held; and any invidious race-distinctions ought not to be allowed to disfigure the Statute Book a day longer than may be absolutely necessary.

3. If a fear is really entertained in any quarter that the very presence of a Native on the Bench will lead to an increase in the practice, said to be very common in this country, "of bringing false charges upon suborned evidence against persons of a different race whom it may be desirable to injure or get rid of," such fear, is to say the least, most unreasonable. The presence on the Bench of Native Magistrates in the Presidency-towns has not led to any such result. There are Hindu Magistrates in the mofussil daily trying cases in which the accused are Mahomedans and vice versa; and again there are both Hindu and Mahomedan Magistrates trying cases in which the accused are Europeans (other than "European British subjects") as well as persons of other alien races. But there is no warrant for asserting that perjury and subornation of perjury and false charges have increased there in consequence. Besides, since 1836, Native Judges in the mofussil have, in civil cases, exercised the same jurisdiction over European British subjects as over others. It yet remains to be discovered that those offences have increased in consequence.

4. I do not think there is much in the argument, which finds favour with some, that a Native Judge or Magistrate is incompetent to try European offenders by reason of his ignorance of European "manners, customs, and habits of thought"; and that two or three years' residence in England is not likely sufficiently to remove that ignorance in the case of a Native Civilian. This argument evidently rests on the assumption that no Judge is competent to try a prisoner with whose "manners, customs, and habits of thought" he is unacquainted. Now, can it be truly predicated of the European Judges and Magistrates, whether in the mofussil, or in the Presidency-towns, that they are acquainted with the "manners, customs, and habits of thought" of every prisoner whom they have to try? The fact is jurisdiction is not conferred at present upon this principle. It will not be difficult to find instances of European Judges, some quite fresh from England, others with even less than two or three years' residence in India, and others again, even, after much longer residence, without any knowledge of a Native language or of Native "manners, customs, and habits of thought," trying Natives upon all sorts of charges. And yet who has ever thought of denying them such jurisdiction on that ground. What is perhaps of more importance is a knowledge of the "manners, customs, and habits of thought" of the Native witnesses, upon whose evidence the determination of the guilt or innocence of the accused depends; and it cannot justly be denied that, as regards that, a Native Judge or Magistrate is much better situated than any European can be.

5. As to the provisions of the Bill, I do not think they go far enough. It seems to me that, as is already the case in civil matters, the procedure of the Court in criminal matters also should be the same, whether the accused are Native subjects of Her Majesty or European subjects. There is no good reason for having special Courts or special modes of trial for the latter. All the subjects of Her Majesty must alike submit to the jurisdiction of the Courts established by Her representatives in India, and the same offences when proved in those Courts, in the ordinary way, should produce the same penal consequences irrespective of the caste of the offenders. All Her Majesty's subjects ought to be equal in the eye of the law. In the Presidency-towns the same tribunals try both classes of them, the same procedure or mode of trial obtains and on conviction the same consequences follow. The substantive criminal law is now the same in the Presidency-towns and in the mofussil. Why then should there be any difference in the procedure? I think with the Chief Justice (see his Minute of 7th June 1882) that the whole of Chapter XXXII of the Criminal Procedure Code may advantageously be repealed, a short enactment being passed providing that "No person shall by reason of his descent or place of birth be in any criminal proceeding exempted from the jurisdiction of any of the Courts." With reference to paragraph 2 of the "Statement of Objects and Reasons" accompanying the Bill, it seems to me that such an enactment would more effectually settle the question now before the Legislative Council. Having regard to the progressive policy of Government, and bearing in mind how the same question as regards civil cases was settled in 1836, one may safely say that some day or other it will have to be settled in the same way as regards criminal cases also. If so, it may as well be so settled now as ten or twenty years hence. The existing provisions of the law as to transfer of cases from one Court to another, appeals against convictions, suspension of sentences, and revision, are amply sufficient for the protection of Her Majesty's European subjects no less than for that of Her Native subjects; and all fear of their proving insufficient for that purpose is utterly unfounded. The longer the existing anomaly is allowed to continue in deference to the unreasoning clamour now raised for its continuance the greater will be the difficulty of removing it hereafter. If the Legislature had listened to similar clamour in 1836, the law on the subject of civil jurisdiction would to this day have continued in the same unsatisfactory state as before. There was no lack then of people predicting all manner of evil consequences from the passing of what is known as the Black Act. Half a century's experience of its working, however, has shown them to be false prophets, not one of those consequences having followed. Who can now say that the Government then were not perfectly justified in disregarding the opposition to it? Should it, however, be deemed expedient not to go the whole length just now, the Bill may be passed at once as it stands. To withdraw it is out of the question. It would be a retrograde move, likely to produce many embarrassments in future.

6. With reference to the suggestions contained in the Chief Secretary's letter, dated 17th April 1883, it seems to me that, in trying to remove one invidious race distinction by legislation, care should be taken to avoid, if possible, the creation of another. All trials before a Court of Session in the mofussil are at present either by jury or with the aid of assessors, whoever the accused may happen to be (section 268, Criminal Procedure Code). If Europeans prefer the former mode of trial, the Natives are by no means opposed to it; and Government, having the power (section 269 of the same Code), may at once direct such mode to be adopted in all cases. In this way they will be conferring a boon which all Her Majesty's subjects will equally value. They will, at the same time, be removing another existing anomaly—different modes of trial in the Presidency-towns and in the mofussil. Education has made such progress in every part of India within the last thirty years as to justify a hope that no difficulty will be experienced in finding a sufficient number of competent persons to act as jurors, wherever a Court of Session is held. I am opposed on principle to the creation of special tribunals for the trial of any one class of Her Majesty's subjects; but if Government deem it expedient to do so, there is no necessity for any new legislation on the subject. They already have the power, under sections 15 and 16 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to direct two or more Magistrates in the mofussil to sit together as a Bench, and to make rules for the guidance of such Benches.

No. 4005, dated 14th June, 1883.

From—C. GONNE, Esq., Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

In continuation of my letter No. 3897, dated the 11th instant, I am directed to forward, for the information of the Government of India, copy of a minute by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice

Pinhey, Judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature, Bombay, containing his opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Minute by the Honourable MR. JUSTICE PINHEY on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

Just a year ago we were asked by the Government of Bombay to state our opinion "as to whether all members of the Covenanted Service, whether European or Native, ought not to be placed on the same footing, and whether the distinction which now exists between the two classes in regard to their powers of trying Europeans should not be abolished."

2. I had long ago wished to see this distinction abolished, and I, therefore, unhesitatingly initialled a minute by the Chief Justice (Sir C. Sargent) answering the Government reference to this effect.

3. Reading again now the minute of Sir C. Sargent by the light of later experience, I regret that I initialled it; because, although I agree with the whole of that part of it which answers the Government reference, the last paragraph of that minute expresses an opinion on the general question of the propriety of subjecting all European British subjects to the jurisdiction of every Magistrate—whether European or Native—a question about which our opinion was not asked.

4. I am of course still of opinion that it is neither necessary nor just to make any distinction between the European and Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, or to refuse to the latter power to deal with European British subjects in the exercise of their criminal jurisdiction.

5. When the Secretary of State for India advertises yearly that so many appointments in the Covenanted Civil Service will be given away by open competition, he makes no exception or distinction as to Natives of India. If a Native of India is a successful competitor, he receives his appointment subject to no other condition than those which his European competitor has to accept. It seems to me unjust that a Native Covenanted Civilian, when he arrives in India, should find his rights and privileges cut down, merely because he is a Native of India, or that he should be subjected to any disability from which his European fellow-competitor is exempt.

6. And the distinction is in my opinion as unnecessary as it is unjust. The European and the Native pass the same test. You have, therefore, the same guarantee for the education and ability of each. You have the same guarantee for the moral character of the one as of the other. No Native of India ever has or ever will succeed in getting into the Covenanted Civil Service without residing some years in England, and consequently mixing in European society and acquiring a considerable knowledge of the manners and customs and habits of thought of Europeans.

7. If, then, the Bill had gone no further than to do away with the distinction between European and Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, so far as the exercise of criminal jurisdiction is concerned, it would have had my unhesitating and hearty support, but it goes much further; and, so far as it goes further, I think it unnecessary, impolitic and inopportune. Moreover, I object to it nearly as much for its disabling and as for its enabling effect: for not only will it enable Government to give power to Natives of classes (b) and (c) to deal with European British subjects charged with criminal offences, but it will in future prevent Government from giving such power to Europeans who are not members of the Covenanted Civil Service, but who are now invested with the power. I refer to the class of European officers, who are called in the mofussil of this Presidency City Magistrates and to such Deputy Collectors as are Europeans. Members of this class are to be found at Karachi, Poona, Belgaum and other large towns.

8. I need say no more of the Bill, so far as it will disenable Europeans who are not Covenanted Civilians from dealing with Europeans charged with offences. Nor need I say anything of class (d) Cantonment Magistrates: for in this Presidency at least these are always (I believe) European British subjects, generally military officers.

9. Before I state my objections more fully as to classes (b) and (c) I wish to express it as my opinion, that the unreasonable and unseemly clamour which has been raised against the Bill by a portion of the European community in India has been raised in consequence of an entire misconception of the scope of the Bill. It seems to me that the European community, without any careful study of the Bill, have jumped at the conclusion that if the Bill becomes law every European will be liable to the jurisdiction of any, and every, Native Magistrate in respect of any, and every, offence with which he may be charged. The Bill of course does not contemplate any such extension of the criminal jurisdiction of Native Magistrates generally.

10. Besides class (a) Covenanted Civilians (all of whom should, in my opinion, have the same jurisdiction as to persons), and class (d) Cantonment Magistrates (all of whom, in this Presidency at least, are European British subjects), the Bill proposes to enable Government to give jurisdiction over European offenders to two classes of first class Magistrates, class (b) members of the Native Civil Service constituted under the Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3, and class (c) Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, who may be either European British subjects or Natives of India. As to such Assistant Commissioners as are European British subjects, the Bill would not alter the law that now exists. There are no Assistant Commissioners, such as the Bill names, either European or Native, subordinate to the Bombay High Court. Whatever be the objection to conferring on Native Civilians criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects, the same objection would, in my view, exist in the case of Native Assistant Commissioners. I shall, therefore, confine the rest of my remarks to class (b) Native Civilians appointed (by nomination and not by competition) in this country.

11. I have already said that I think the extension of the criminal jurisdiction of Native Civilians unnecessary, impolitic and inopportune. I will state my reasons for so thinking as shortly as I can.

12. Unnecessary.—The proposed change in the law has not been called for either by the persons on whom it is proposed to confer the jurisdiction, or by the persons over whom it is to be exercised. It is a matter of notoriety that the latter strongly object to it. I do not remember ever hearing of a case in which justice was either delayed or frustrated by reason of there being no European Magistrate within reach, when a charge was brought against a supposed European offender. Mr. Gupta, of the Bengal Civil Service, had a grievance and gave expression to it. The Bill, so far as I approve of it, would do away with this grievance and rightly so. No other Native has asked to be given power to try Europeans, and so far as I am capable of forming an opinion, very few Natives, if any, would wish to have to try Europeans.

13. Impolitic.—The new Native Civilians nominated in this country, so far as I have had an opportunity of testing their capacity, are inferior to the Covenanted Civilian, either European or Native, in ability, in education, even in the power of writing simple English. They have never been in English society. They have never associated on terms of equality (most of them have not associated at all) with English men and women. As they have never “crossed the black water,” you have no test of their moral courage. As they are appointed without examination, you have no guarantee for their education beyond the poor one afforded by departmental examinations. They are not appointed on their own merits, but generally because their fathers are distinguished servants of Government or prominent citizens, or else because their fathers or uncles are greatly esteemed by some one in or out of the Government service, who has influence enough or perseverance enough to get his nominee appointed a civilian. I know as a fact that the Native community generally are greatly discontented with the present mode of nominating Natives to the Civil Service. Can it be politic to give to such as these a new power, a new jurisdiction over a proud and hitherto dominant (and perhaps it may justly be added domineering) race? I cannot think so. It is easy of course to be wise after the event, but I think my opinion on this point derives confirmation from the outburst of passion (Native as well as European) which the introduction of the Bill in the Legislative Council has produced; albeit Native and European alike have misconceived the scope of the Bill, however it was not a mere transient outburst of passion. The discussions that have taken place in the press and elsewhere during the pendency of the Bill have produced a state of race antagonism, such as I have never known since the terrible events of 1857.

14. Inopportune—Of course, from what I have said above, I must consider that portion of the Bill to which I object is inopportune. But I do not say, and I do not think, that, as time goes on, the race distinctions, which it is the object of the Bill to modify, may not be modified as they have already been modified from time to time. But the method of recruiting the Native Civil Service must first be modified. The race antagonism which the inopportune introduction of this Bill has excited must be allowed to subside. It was decreasing rapidly before the Bill. It will again decrease if the Bill be altered to the extent that would be necessary, in my opinion, to make it a just and a wise Bill.

15. I cannot close these remarks without noticing that it appears to me that some of my colleagues in their observations appear to have fallen into the popular error of considering the scope of the Bill much wider than it is.

Judges of the Court.

Judges' opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I am desired to say that the Judges have considered the Bill, together with its annexures, and the abstract of the proceedings of the Legislative Council, so far as they relate to that measure.

2. The Judges consider it to be their duty to express, without reserve, the views which they entertain, not only upon the form and language of the Bill, but on its general policy and probable effects.

3. The Statement of Objects and Reasons sets forth that, “after consulting the Local Governments, at the Government of India has arrived at the conclusion that the time has arrived for modifying the existing law and removing the present bar upon the investment of Native Magistrates in the interior with powers over European British subjects; and that the Government has, accordingly, decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions."

With this view the Bill amends section 22 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which at present restricts the appointment of Justices of the Peace to European British subjects, by empowering the Government to appoint any Magistrate of the first class, who is either (a) a member of the Covenanted Civil Service, or (b) a member of the Native Civil Service constituted under 33 Vict., c. 3, or (c) an Assistant Commissioner in Non-Regulation Provinces, or (d) a Cantonment Magistrate, to be a Justice of the Peace.

4. The Bill next amends section 25 of the Code, so as to provide that all Sessions Judges and Magistrates of the District shall be Justices of the Peace for the territories of the Local Government under which they are serving. It then repeals so much of sections 443 and 444 of the Code, respectively, as limits jurisdiction over European British subjects to such Magistrates and Sessions Judges as are themselves European British subjects.

5. Accordingly, if this Bill becomes law, the effect will be that (1) all Native Sessions Judges and Magistrates of the District will, ex-officio, exercise the same jurisdiction over European British subjects as is now exercised by European officials of the same class; and (2) the Government will be empowered to invest any Native Magistrate of the first class, who is either a Covenanted Civilian, or has been appointed under 33 Vict., c. 3, or is an Assistant Commissioner in a Non-Regulation Province, or a Cantonment Magistrate, with the jurisdiction over European British subjects, which by the existing law is restricted to European British subjects.

6. Thus a Native Magistrate, who has been appointed to be a Justice of the Peace, will have jurisdiction (1) to enquire into any charge against an European British subject, and either commit him to the Sessions Court or High Court; or, (2) if the offence be one ordinarily triable by a Magistrate, to try it and impose a sentence of three months' imprisonment or fine up to Rs. 1,000, or both. A Native Sessions Judge or Assistant Judge empowered under section 444 will be competent to try a European British subject for any offence not punishable with death or transportation for life, and to impose a sentence of one year's imprisonment or fine of unlimited amount, or both. Cases for which, in the Sessions Judge's opinion, such a punishment is inadequate, will be transferred to the High Court.

7. Offences punishable with death or transportation for life will remain, in the case of European British subjects, exclusively triable by the High Court. The European British subject will retain his right, under section 451, of claiming a mixed jury or mixed assessors, his special rights of appeal under Chapter XXXI, and his right of applying to the High Court under section 456 in case of unlawful detention.

8. It must be remembered that in India the powers of police investigation, magisterial enquiry, and judicial trial are closely connected and are frequently combined in the same official. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure, as it now stands, any District or Sub-divisional Magistrate, as well as any other Magistrate specially empowered in this behalf (section 191), may take cognizance of any offence, that is, initiate criminal proceedings in respect of any offence (1) upon a complaint made, (2) upon a police report thereof, (3) upon information received from any person other than a police officer, or (4) upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed.

9. It is the duty of the District or Sub-divisional Magistrate to direct investigations, by the police. He receives their daily reports and very often has to instruct them on points which he may think that they have overlooked or misapprehended. It sometimes even happens that the investigation is taken out of the hands of the police and conducted by the Magistrate himself (section 159). The result of this is that a chief local Magistrate practically becomes the prosecutor and may become the Judge notwithstanding that he may have formed a strong opinion on the case behind the back of the accused without having heard his explanation or defence. This is the system in force in India; and although it is probably, for administrative reasons, unavoidable, it is an extremely dangerous system. It has certainly provoked adverse criticism: that it has not provoked more is probably due to the careful superintendence bestowed by District Magistrates, who have in Bengal hitherto been English gentlemen of the Covenanted Civil Service, whose education and training have made them fully sensible of the responsibilities which such a system as that described imposes on them in their own proceedings and also in supervising the proceedings of their subordinate Sub-divisional Magistrates. The present law protects European British subjects from the exercise of this dangerous combination of duties by any one but their own countrymen. The Bill under consideration proposes to remove this protection.

10. The general result, accordingly, of the proposed amendments will be to leave European British subjects in the possession of various important rights as regards the class of officer who can commit or try them, the form of trial, the right of appeal, and the power of invoking the aid of the High Court when they are unlawfully detained in custody; but to deprive them of the right, which they at present enjoy, that in every case the enquiry or trial shall be conducted by an European British subject. It will become the duty, ex-officio, of Native officers of a particular class to commit or try European prisoners, even in cases in which, in person or through the police, they have initiated investigations affecting them; and the Government will be empowered to select from a wide area such other Natives as it thinks well to invest with such powers.

11. The position in which European British subjects would be placed by the proposed changes is one which they have never yet occupied, and in which the Legislature has on several occasions deliberately determined that it would not be wise to place them. On a review of the course of legislation since 1793, it is impossible, the Judges consider, to doubt that the intention and practice of the Government has been to surround the investigation and trial of offences, charged against European British subjects in the mufassal with special precautions and, amongst those precautions, to restrict the jurisdiction in such cases to European officials. Any doubts which the wording of particular Acts, as e.g., Act VII of 1853, might have occasioned, have been removed by the express declarations of the Codes of 1861 and 1872, in both of which this restriction was deliberately enacted.

12. On the other hand, as regards European officials, the result of the proposed change will be to curtail considerably the powers now exercised by Government in the appointment of Justices of the Peace. At present, the Government can appoint such European British subjects as it thinks fit to be Justices of the Peace. This power has been hitherto extensively employed, and Europeans, other than Covenanted Civilians, have been appointed to be Justices of the Peace, and dispose, in a manner which the Judges believe to be satisfactory, of cases in which Europeans are concerned. Under the amended section, the Government will be unable to appoint any one who does not fall within one of the four classes specified in the amendment. There are at present in Bengal many such Justices of the Peace whose appointments would have been impossible under the amended section.

13. The first argument adduced in favour of the proposed change in the law, which the Judges propose to consider, is that on which His Excellency the Viceroy grounded his support of the Bill in the discussion of the 9th March in the Legislative Council, viz., the expediency of taking at once a step which the policy of admitting Natives to the service rendered sooner or later inevitable. "It is surely clear," His Excellency observed, "that though there is not at the present moment an irresistible necessity for introducing this measure, as Lord Lytton's system develops, an irresistible difficulty will arise. When you have one-sixth of the Civil Service composed of Natives, it will be impossible to maintain the present restriction. Therefore what we had to consider was, is it better to wait until this necessity becomes overwhelming and irresistible, or is it better to introduce the system now? I confess, it appears to me, that it is far wiser and far more in the true and substantial interests of those over whom this jurisdiction is exercised, that it should be introduced now, when the persons who would obtain these powers are very limited in number; when the circumstances under which they enter the Civil Service insure their ability and character, and when all their proceedings can be carefully watched. Being few in number, it will be easier now than afterwards for the attention of the Local Governments and the public to be directed to their proceedings, and, being the men they are, it seems to me that they would be likely to set a good example and give a good tone to those who come after them. I hold it, therefore to be wiser to introduce the measure now, gradually, cautiously, and tentatively, than to wait till the change is forced upon us by necessity, and the powers, which are now to be given only to a few men, have to be given suddenly to a very much larger number of Native Civil Servants. This is the ground upon which I thought that the time had come when this change could best be made."

14. The Judges fully appreciate the necessity of adjusting the judicial machinery of the Courts to the declared policy of the Secretary of State as regards the employment of Natives in the judicial service. But they do not perceive that that policy necessarily involves any such change as that now suggested; nor, in any case, do they consider that the proper moment for making such a change has arrived, or that materials at present exist for deciding on the form which it ought to assume.

The accompanying table shows that of the Civilians on the Bengal list there are at present twelve Natives, either Covenanted Civilians, or persons admitted under 33 Vict., c. 3. Of these, two have been over 11 years in the service, one over 10, one over 9 years, one has been over 7 years. The rest have been under 5 years, and of these, five have served less than 3 years. Moreover, since 1875 only one Native Civilian has passed through the competitive examination, and that was in 1879. Since that year all the admissions have been under the Statute. There are, accordingly, only four officers who, in the ordinary course, would for some time to come be either Magistrates of the District or Sessions Judges. As regards the rest, no question is likely to arise for several years.

N.B.—The last four Officers have not yet passed their examinations completely, and as officers are not considered eligible for promotion until they pass fully, it is difficult to determine the probable time when they will rise to the rank of Officiating Magistrates or Officiating Judges. It takes an officer 7 years or thereabouts from date of passing to rise to the position of an Officiating Magistrate, and about 8 years to get an Officiating Judgechip.

15. These figures appear to the Judges to indicate that the question of the jurisdiction of Native Civilians over European British subjects cannot be regarded as in any way pressing for immediate solution. Though it may be intended that Native officials shall ultimately constitute a sixth of the entire Civil Service, there do not appear to be grounds for expecting that this intention will be realized for many years to come. It would appear, moreover, that various causes have, of late years, led Native candidates to refrain from seeking admission to the Civil Service by the competitive examination, and that the main body of Native Civilians will for the future be those who are appointed in this country under 33 Vict., c. 3. Such a state of things scarcely seems to justify prospective legislation on the ground that an irresistible necessity is impending, which can be at present more conveniently and safely met than at a later date. The Covenanted Native Civilians, who have passed into the service by the competitive examination, constitute, it is apparent, a small and dwindling class. So far as can be judged at present, the supply has come to a standstill; nor, as to admissions under 33 Vict., c. 3, does it appear that the Local Governments have found it feasible to carry out the provisions of the Act except on a very limited scale. Three officers appear to have been appointed in Bengal in 1880, one in 1881, one in 1882. At present, therefore, the measure can, it is obvious, scarcely be regarded as having passed beyond the stage of an experiment. How these officials will turn out is a question on which it is at present, and must be for some years to come, impossible to form any confident opinion. Even as regards the earlier appointments, the Judges are of opinion that they have been too few in number, and, in the majority of instances, have lasted for too short a time, to afford material for any safe generalization, or to justify, on the ground of ascertained fitness, a change in the policy of Government which would take away from European British subjects a privilege which, it is apparent, they regard as of high value and importance.

16. If some years hence, owing to the number of Native Civilians having greatly increased any administrative difficulty should arise and a change in the existing arrangements be considered necessary, such a change will, the Judges think, be more safely made at a time when there are better means than at present of judging both of the administrative difficulties which have to be met and of the capacity and character of the class of officials whose powers and responsibilities it will have the effect of enlarging. The increase in the number of Native officials will not render the supervision of their behaviour in any way more difficult than it is at present. On the other hand, longer experience and a better acquaintance with the particular points, as to which supervision is found to be necessary, would enable the superintending authority to perform its duties more efficiently. At any rate legislation, should it hereafter be necessary, would proceed on a basis of practical experience, not, as it is likely to do now, on mere conjecture as to the conduct and character of officers about whom scarcely anything is known.

17. In considering the question whether legislation is at present advisable, it is necessary to keep in view the wide distinction which exists between Native officers who have entered the Civil Service by competitive examination in England, and those who are nominated under 33 Vict., c. 3, in this country. The Judges are not prepared to admit that, even as regards the former class, the proposed change in the law is any way necessary or desirable: but here there is, at any rate, some guarantee for ability, moral character, and such insight into the feelings of Englishmen as a short residence in England may be supposed to confer. On the other hand, with the statutory Civilians there is absolutely no guarantee against the existence of the very defects which constitute the grounds of the reluctance of European British subjects to submit to their jurisdiction in criminal trials. They are described by the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in a document, forwarded by the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces with his own reply to the Government of India, as "often being men saturated with caste and religious prejudice and ignorant of European modes of thought and feeling." One object of the Statute was, the Judges believe, to enable the Government to enrol in the ranks of its service Native gentleman of high birth and social position. It is easy to imagine cases in which a gentleman might have on these grounds great claims to a nomination under the Statute, who might yet be conspicuously deficient in many of the qualifications which are admittedly essential in the Judge who is to deal with cases in which European British subjects are concerned. It must be remembered that it is with officials of this class, not with successful competitors in the Civil Service Examination, that, in considering the present question, we have principally to deal: nor can the Judges lose sight of the fact that these Statutory Civilians will be appointed by a system of nomination which was abandoned by the Government 25 years ago in favour of competitive examination, and which can scarcely be expected to work more satisfactorily in India than it did in England. On the officers thus nominated the proposed change will confer a jurisdiction unknown to English law, a combination of inquisitorial, magisterial and judicial powers, which may be justified by the necessities of the case of India, but which Englishmen in India may with some reason contend, should continue to be exercised in their own case, as it is at present, only by officials for whose competence or character they have some adequate guarantee.

18. The apprehensions which many Europeans entertain as to the results of the proposed change are not, in the Judges' opinion, without foundation. There is no doubt that the position of Europeans in the mufassal has many disadvantages. They are often completely isolated, they live among people alien to themselves in religion, nationality, social habits and political ideas. As owners of property and employers of labour, they are necessarily brought into collision with classes or individuals whose interests conflict with their own; and it is impossible to ignore the fact that such a state of things exposes them to very considerable risks. The attention of the Government was forcibly drawn to this fact by the Hon'ble Sir Stuart Bayley in the debate of March 9th. "There is," he said, "another aspect to the case of the opposition which I think deserves most attentive consideration, and this is the real danger which the isolated European, living in the mufassal, runs from having false cases trumped up against him. It is right that I should state publicly that this danger is a very real and very serious one, for probably no Member of this Council has had the same experience as I have of the lives led by planters in the mufassal. My own experience has given me a strong feeling on this matter, and any one who knows the extreme bitterness with which disputes about land are fought out in the mufassal, and the unscrupulous methods to which recourse is had in conducting these disputes before the Court,—methods to which a planter cannot have recourse,—will understand how precarious his position may become, and how essential to him it is that the law should be well and wisely administered."

19. The Judges concur in the views here expressed; and they consider that the dangers thus described in the case of planters and manufacturers would be even greater in the case of persons in a humbler position in life—railway employes, artificers, and the like. These men are continually brought into contact with Natives in ways which may easily give rise to misunderstandings and ill-will. Should an accusation be brought against them, they labour under great disadvantages: they are often isolated from other Europeans; they generally have but an imperfect acquaintance with the vernacular languages; they are unable to retain the costly services of European advocates; and they might, in some circumstances, find it impossible to secure the assistance even of Native practitioners. It is easy to see how the grossest injustice might easily be inflicted in such cases by an officer who from any cause failed fully to realise the position of the accused. It is at any rate certain that Europeans of this class would feel an entire want of confidence in any but a European tribunal. On the whole, after making every allowance for temporary excitement and agitation, it is, the Judges think, impossible to doubt that European residents in the mufassal do really consider themselves to be, and in fact are, in a position which justifies them in regarding the privilege of being tried by a European, on whose independence and impartiality they can fully rely, as one of very real importance to them.

20. Accordingly, as the number of Native officials who will be affected by the proposed change is extremely small; as it seems probable that the majority of Native officials will for the future be statutory nominees appointed in this country without any guarantee as to ability and not, necessarily, possessing any acquaintance with the habits or feelings of Englishmen; as there is no evidence of any real demand for any such alteration; as the proposed change will disqualify a class of European officers who at present perform their duties to the entire satisfaction of the Government and the public; and as it cannot, it appears, be effected without a revival of animosities and class-feelings, which are, on every account, to be deplored, the Judges consider that nothing short of grave and pressing reasons could justify its introduction.

21. But, so far as their own observations go, the Judges are unaware of the existence of any of the reasons on which a legislative change is usually demanded. In the exercise of their duties of superintendence and revision, they have occasion to watch attentively the working of the criminal Courts, the returns of which are continually before them. Nothing in those returns indicates that there is at present any administrative inconvenience, any miscarriage of justice, any hardship inflicted on prosecutors, witnesses, or accused, or any dissatisfaction felt with the provisions of the Code as to the jurisdiction of the Courts. Some provisions of the Code are, the Judges are aware, believed by some persons to operate severely, and any measure for the reform of these would deserve consideration. It might be well, for instance, to consider the possibility of extending to Natives in the mufassal, under certain conditions, the right, of the nature of a Habeas Corpus, now exclusively enjoyed by Europeans, of applying to the High Court in cases of unlawful detention. But as regards the powers conferred on the several classes of Courts and the rights enjoyed by European British subjects in criminal cases, the Judges are not aware that there is any feeling of grievance or, except amongst a few individuals, any wish for change. On the contrary, the Judges believe, that the privileges now enjoyed by Europeans are readily acquiesced in by the main body of Natives, who understand and sympathise with the natural desire of Europeans to be tried by their own countrymen, and who appreciate the evils to which any alteration of the existing law may probably conduce.

22. They are confirmed in this view by the fact that, though the Criminal Procedure Code was for several years under consideration, and was criticised minutely by every Local Government, and though a very large body of official opinion was collected from every rank in the service, no suggestion on the subject was made by any responsible authority till Sir A. Eden's communication of the 20th March 1882, enclosing Mr. Gupta's letter of 30th January 1882.

23. The Judges find that their views as to this part of the subject are endorsed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, who, in his speech on 9th March, observed that "there were a great many facts which supported the contention that there is no administrative difficulty in connection with the matter," and expressed his conviction that "this measure is unnecessary in the present condition and constitution of the Native judicial Covenanted Service in Bengal."

24. On these grounds the Judges are of opinion that there is nothing in the present condition or prospects of the Service which renders a change of the law expedient; nor do they think that any necessity is likely to arise within any period sufficiently near to require or justify legislation, specially when that legislation arouses apprehensions and animosities which are on every ground matter of regret.

25. In connection with this part of the subject, it may be well to point out that the rapid development of railway and telegraphic communication, which has been urged by some of the supporters of the Bill as a reason for considering it to be free from danger, goes far, and will year by year go farther, to meet the argument based on administrative necessity. There are few parts of India and there will soon, it is to be hoped, be none in which a European cannot be forwarded to any place, in which it may be desired to try him, with ease, speed, and economy. Europeans in India are, for the most part, at the present day, for all practical purposes, far nearer to the tribunals, to which they are subject, than they have ever been before; and their transmission from one place to another will, year by year, become a matter of less difficulty.

26. The foregoing considerations, in the Judges' opinion, sufficiently dispose of the question of the expediency of introducing the measure at the present time. But some of the grounds on which the defence of the proposed change in the law was rested by the supporters of the Bill, seem to the Judges to call for observation. In the first place, as to the reasons adduced for the change. "The only object we have in view," it was observed by the Honourable Member who moved the introduction of the Bill, "is to provide for the impartial and effectual administration of justice. It is by this test that we desire our proposals to be tried." Tried by that test the proposal seems to the Judges indefensible, for no one has suggested that the present administration of justice is not effectual and impartial, or that it will become in any degree more impartial or more effectual by the proposed alteration. On the contrary, the proposal is that a class of cases, which are admitted to be of so "exceptionally troublesome and difficult a character" as to justify their exclusion from the cognizance of any but specially qualified tribunals, shall be no longer confined to a class of officials who, in their disposal, at present give entire satisfaction and command entire confidence, but shall become cognizable by officials who, speaking generally, offer a less complete guarantee for impartiality and independence,—who necessarily labour under the disadvantages arising from difference of nationality and social habits, and in whom the portion of the community concerned confessedly places less confidence than in the existing tribunals. If, as the Hon'ble Member says, the trial of Europeans is "apt to put an exceptionally severe strain on the judicial qualities of tact, judgment, patience, and impartiality," it is difficult to understand how the interests of justice can be promoted by committing these cases to officials who are regarded, and the Judges consider rightly regarded, as less qualified to deal with them than those who at present are empowered to do so. Under the proposed law any Native Assistant Commissioner, who has served long enough to become a first class Magistrate, might, in Assam or in any other Non-Regulation Province, be empowered to commit or try Europeans. Europeans may not unreasonably regard such an arrangement as providing less satisfactorily than the existing law for the impartial and effectual administration of justice in their own case. It is no disparagement of the integrity or ability of a Native Judge to say that he is necessarily more amenable to the external influences to which popular feeling, local prejudice or the wishes and interests of powerful individuals may give rise, than is a European officer, to whom such matters are for the most part unknown. It would be easy to conceive cases in which it would require no ordinary fortitude and independence on the part of a Native official to run counter to the prevailing sentiments of the society in which he lives. It not unfrequently happens that our superior officials are asked to transfer an important case from some Native Judge or Magistrate, not because from deficiency of experience or judicial knowledge he is unable to try it, but because one side or other apprehends (and sometimes even both sides unite in this respect) that some unknown or improper influence will be brought to bear on that officer.

27. In this respect it is necessary to point out that the present measure differs fundamentally from those by which in years past Europeans have been brought gradually within the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal Courts. On each of those occasions the reform had this strong justification that it was really demanded in the interest of an impartial and effectual administration of the law. Justice could not, it is obvious, be done between Europeans and others either in civil or criminal cases so long as a European could be brought before no tribunal nearer than the presidency town. Such a state of the law was in many cases tantamount to a denial of justice; and in criminal matters it practically, in all but very serious cases, secured impunity to the favoured class. On these grounds the changes, heretofore made, were justifiable and wise. But on the present occasion it cannot be suggested that the change will make the trial or punishment of European criminals in any one respect easier, speedier, cheaper or more certain.

28. One of the grounds most frequently alleged in support of the Bill was that the present state of the law was anomalous, and that this anomaly justified legislation. As to this, it is, the Judges think, enough to point out that the entire structure of Indian society and the British administration rests on personal laws, under which particular classes or individuals enjoy special rights apart from the general law applicable to the entire community. These rights have been solemnly guaranteed to the inhabitants of the country and are conscientiously respected by the Legislature and the Courts. The principle laid down in the preamble of 21 Geo. III, c. 70, that it was "expedient that the inhabitants should be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of all their ancient laws, usages, rights and privileges," has been consistently maintained: and the Act which at present regulates the Civil Courts in Bengal (Act VI of 1871) expressly provides that, in all questions regarding succession, inheritance, marriage or caste, or religious usage or institution, the personal law of Hindus and Muhammadans shall be the rule of decision. These personal rights are observed, so far as the Judges are aware, with equal care, and with ready acquiescence, by the people in their dealings with one another. They are insisted on by the class concerned whenever they appear to be endangered. Only a year ago the entire Hindu and Muhammadan communities were exempted from some of the most important provisions of the "Transfer of Property Act" out of respect to the wishes of certain native gentlemen who were apprehensive that the proposed enactment might be regarded as discountenancing their view of the Hindu Law. Such being the universal rule, the English in India may, the Judges think, with some reason demand that a like regard may be paid to their personal rights, for which they have at any rate the prescription of long usage, which they highly prize, and which are not shown to conflict in any way with the rights of any class. The question asked in the course of discussion on the Code of 1872, when the law was placed on its present footing, seems to the Judges extremely pertinent—"Are English people to be told that, while it is their duty to respect all these laws scrupulously, they are to claim nothing for themselves? that, while the English Courts are to respect and even enforce a variety of laws, which are thoroughly repugnant to all the strongest convictions of Englishmen, Englishmen who settle in this country are to surrender privileges to which, rightly or otherwise, they attach the highest possible importance?"

29. Another ground urged in support of the proposed change in the law, is the invidious character of the existing distinction. If by "invidious" is meant that the law, as it stands, unfairly benefits Europeans to the detriment of natives, or that the privilege now enjoyed by Europeans can justly be regarded as offensive to native feeling, the Judges are unable to see any foundation for such a charge. It is not suggested that the rights now enjoyed by Europeans should be extended to the entire community, or that the proposed change would improve in any particular the general administration of the law. If by the abolition of the present rights of Europeans the natives would be benefited, the balance of advantages might have to be struck; but this is not the case. No practical advantage for natives is to be gained.

30. If even, apart from considerations of practical benefit, there were reason to think that the present state of the law was, or could reasonably be, regarded by natives as humiliating or insulting to them or their countrymen, the Judges would consider that the possibility of remedying such a state of things deserved serious attention. But they cannot believe that such is the case. There is nothing in the existing law which implies any personal disparagement to any one. There may be in the ranks of the native service officials who resent the existing law because it impliedly recognizes the existence of a difference between Europeans and natives, and because they regard such a recognition as obsolete, injurious and oppressive. The Judges cannot regard such feelings as deserving of sympathy or consideration. Those differences, as a fact, exist, and any attempt to ignore them would, the Judges believe, be unwise and disastrous. So far as the present measure encourages the belief in any class of the community that such differences have ceased to exist—that Hindus and Englishmen can live side by side, not only with just and equal laws, but with absolute identity of status in every particular, it must, the Judges consider, be regarded as a probable source of future difficulty. No reasonable official need feel aggrieved or humiliated because the law lays down a general rule that a class of especially difficult cases shall be tried by the officials who are confessedly most competent to try them, to whom their trial has hitherto been invariably confined, and to whom the class concerned earnestly desires that they should continue to be restricted. As was observed in the debate of 1872, "The privilege as to jurisdiction is the privilege of the prisoner, not the privilege of the Judge. The European has an objection to be tried by a native. Considering the position in which he stands, the question is whether you will put him in a position in which he does not at present stand. You place no slight upon a native by saying that he can only try a man of his own race. What is there against the feelings of the native in that? Why should any one feel a slight because he is told that a particular man is to be tried in a particular way. On the other hand, it is a feeling, and not an unnatural one, that a man should wish to be tried by his own countrymen." This feeling, as a fact, is recognized by the provisions of the Code which allow Europeans and natives alike to claim that at least half of the jury, by which they are to be tried, shall consist of persons of their own race.

31. Much reliance has been placed on the argument that for many years past Native Magistrates have in the Presidency towns exercised jurisdiction over European British subjects without giving rise to complaint. As to this, it is, the Judges think, enough to say that the position of the Presidency Magistrates, from the close proximity of the High Courts, the facilities thus afforded for supervision and control, the presence of a large and influential Bar, the activity of the local press, and the influence of public opinion renders it safe to entrust these officials with far more extensive powers than could be safely conceded in the case of Mofussil

* C. P. C., 411.

Magistrates. This view has been adopted by the Legislature, which empowers * a Presidency Magistrate to pass a sentence of imprisonment for six months or fine of Rs. 200 without any appeal, whereas in the mofussil 1st class Magistrates and Sessions Judges are unable to pass a higher sentence than one month or Rs. 50 fine without appeal; and in the case of European British subjects no order passed by either is unappealable. For these reasons the Judges cannot consider the experience of the Presidency Magistrates' Courts as in any degree justifying the investment of native officers in the mofussil with jurisdiction over Europeans.

32. Lastly, the Judges have to consider the question of the finality of the Bill. They are of course, perfectly satisfied that any assurances which may be given by the present Government or any members of it in that respect will be fully and faithfully adhered to. But such assurances would not be binding upon any future Government, and still less upon the native community. There would seem to be no elements of finality, either in the Bill itself, or in its subject-matter. There is no reason why those, in deference to whose wishes the Bill has been introduced, should accept it otherwise than as a prelude to still larger concessions; and it may probably be more difficult in the future for Europeans to protect their rights when the principle upon which those rights depend has once been invaded.

33. The Judges have endeavoured in the preceding remarks to explain why they consider the grounds for the introduction of the Bill to be insufficient. They believe that they have shown that it is justified by no necessity, either immediately present or sufficiently near at hand to require consideration: that the Native Civilians who enter the service by competition are a small and dwindling class: that nothing is as yet, or can be for many years, known of the officers appointed under 33 Vict., c. 3, except that they have not had the residence in England which is supposed by some to render the Covenanted Civilians competent to exercise the proposed jurisdiction; that the circumstances of mofussil life render the present privileges of Europeans in the Criminal Courts not a mere sentimental gratification but an important safeguard against a real danger: that the measure cannot be defended as contributing to the more effectual and impartial administration of justice—an object which the present law sufficiently attains, and which it is not pretended that the amended law would attain any better: that in this respect the present Bill differs from former measures of a like nature, which had for their object the removal of an acknowledged grievance: that the anomaly involved in the present state of the law is merely one instance of a state of things on which the entire structure of Indian society depends: that the right, which the proposed legislation will take away, ought not to be, and in fact is not generally regarded as invidious or oppressive: and finally that the Bill does not possess the elements of finality claimed for it, but on the contrary must, whatever be the wishes of the Government, be hereafter made the standing ground from which further innovations will be demanded. On these grounds the Judges feel bound to express their strong disapproval of the Bill.

34. I am directed to state that the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Mitter will record his opinions on the subject of the Bill in a separate minute.

No. 910, dated 1st June, 1883.

From—C. A. WILKINS, Esq., Officiating Registrar, High Court, Calcutta.

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Dept.

In continuation of the High Court's letter No. 866 of the 23rd ultimo, communicating, for the information of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, the views of the Court on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, Act X of 1882, I am directed to forward, for the consideration of His Excellency in Council, the accompanying printed copy of a Minute, dated 25th ultimo, recorded by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Mitter on the same subject

Minute by the HON'BLE MR. JUSTICE MITTER upon the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill, dated 25th May 1883.

We have been asked to give our opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects. I think that, in submitting our opinion, it is not our province, as judicial officers, to discuss the principle of the Bill so far as it involves the general policy of the State.

I shall therefore confine myself to the consideration of the two following questions:—

- (1) To what extent the Bill in question proposes to take away from the European British subjects any right or privilege which they have hitherto enjoyed;
- (2) What would be the result of the proposed change in the Criminal Procedure Code on the administration of justice in the country.

With reference to the first question, it has been said that, as various sections of the community in India are allowed to enjoy their personal laws on various matters, the European British subjects should not be deprived of the privilege of being tried by a Judge who is himself a European British subject—a privilege hitherto secured to them by the personal laws which they have been allowed to retain in this country. So far as the criminal laws of the country are concerned, I am not aware of any distinction in their application to the people of the various races inhabiting British India. Whether a criminal be a Hindu, a Mahomedan, a Buddhist, a Sikh, or a Parsee, he is subject to the jurisdiction of the same tribunal and is amenable to the same criminal laws.

But, apart from this, it seems to me that there is hardly any foundation for the statement that the personal laws which a European British subject has been allowed to retain in this country confer upon him the privilege of being tried only by a Judge who is himself a European British subject.

A native subject of British India would not be considered an alien in Great Britain. Subject to certain qualifications, which have nothing to do with the country of his birth, he would be, I imagine, eligible there to be appointed a Justice of the Peace or a Judge of the High Court of Judicature. He would be eligible to serve as a juror in a criminal trial, whatever might be the nationality of the accused person. If what I have stated above be in accordance with the provisions of the English Law, then there is no foundation for the contention that the personal laws, which a European British subject has been allowed to retain in this country confer upon him the right or privilege of being tried by a Judge who is also a European British subject.

Then it may be said that, whether a European British subject enjoys that right in England or not, he has enjoyed that right in India since the commencement of the British Rule. It seems to me that this proposition is equally untenable. It is true that European British subjects, at the commencement of the British Rule in India, were conceded the right of carrying with them the laws governing them in England both in civil and criminal matters. In both these matters the provisions of the English Law were administered in cases in which they were concerned.

In the Presidency of Bengal, a Supreme Court of Judicature was established at Fort William in Bengal under 13 Geo. III, Cap. 63; the 14th section of which provided that the jurisdiction of that Court should extend "to all British subjects," who were residents of any part of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa then under the protection of the East India Company. By section 38 of this Statute, "the Governor General in Council and the Judges of the Supreme Court" were vested with the powers of Justices of the Peace within the settlement of Fort William.

By section 29 of 26 Geo. III, Cap. 57, European British subjects were declared amenable "to the Courts of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery and Courts of General or Quarter Sessions of the Peace in any of the British settlements in India" for offences committed in India and other places mentioned therein.

By section 151 of 33 Geo. III, Cap. 52, power was given to the Governor General in Council to appoint any "Covenanted Servant" of the East India Company, or any "other British inhabitant," to act as a Justice of the Peace in any place in British India.

By section 19 of Regulation IX of 1793 and section 2 of Regulation II of 1796, it was declared that European British subjects were amenable only to the Supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta, for offences committed in the interior of the country. Provisions were made in the latter Regulation and Regulation XV of 1806 for the commitment of such offenders to the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

By section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155, a Magistrate of a District was empowered to take cognizance of certain defined petty offences committed by a European British subject against any "Native of India."

By section 1 of Act IV of 1843, provisions were made for appeals against the convictions of European British subjects by Magistrates and Justices of the Peace. This Act shows that a Magistrate of a District, although not a Justice of the Peace, was competent to take cognizance of complaints relating to offences mentioned in section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155, committed by a European British subject.

The next legislation in India on this subject was Act No. VII of 1853. By section 1, the provisions of section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155, and of Act IV of 1843, were extended to offences mentioned in it, committed "against the person or property of any person whatever." Under section 105, referred to above, it was restricted to such offences committed against a Native of India.

Section 2 of this Act says:—"The powers in such cases"—i.e., cases coming within the purview of section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155—"given to the Magistrate of the Zillah or District may be lawfully exercised by any Joint Magistrate, or other person lawfully exercising the powers of a Magistrate, in the case of any such offence as aforesaid, which may hereafter be committed within the district over which his authority extends."

Under section 3 of Act XV of 1843, a person, other than a European British subject, was eligible to be appointed a Deputy Magistrate exercising the full powers of a Magistrate. Under Act VII of 1853, therefore, a Deputy Magistrate, who was not a European British subject and who had not been appointed a Justice of the Peace, could, if vested with the full powers of a Magistrate, take cognizance of cases mentioned in section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155. But the law on this subject was again altered by section 42 of Act XXV of 1861, which contained the proviso to the effect that the jurisdiction given by the aforesaid Statute and Act VII of 1853 should be exercised only by a Justice of the Peace.

The next legislation on the subject in question is Act II of 1869, by section 3 of which the Governor General of India in Council and the Local Governments were empowered to appoint Justices of the Peace "from the Covenanted Civil Servants of the Crown in India, or other British inhabitants." At that time, viz., 1869, a native of this country was a member of the Covenanted Civil Service. This Act was followed by Act XXII of 1870, which confirmed certain laws affecting European British subjects, passed by the Governors of the Presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in Council. These laws were further confirmed by 34 and 35 Vic., Cap. XXXIV, the second section of which provides that a Magistrate, who is a Justice of the Peace, is competent to commit a European British subject to the Court of Sessions or to the High Court, if he be authorised on that behalf by an Act of the Indian Legislature.

It will be convenient here to notice briefly the Jury Rules which obtained in the Supreme Court at Calcutta. Under Geo. III, Cap. 68, section 34, it was provided that in the Supreme Court at Calcutta "all offences and misdemeanours," whether committed by a European British subject or not, "should be tried by a Jury of British subjects, resident in the town of Calcutta, and not otherwise." But by 7 Geo. IV, Cap. 37, it was declared that "all good and sufficient persons resident within the limits of the several towns of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay" should be deemed qualified as jurors. There was this further provision in this Statute, that the Grand Juries in all cases and all the Juries for the trial of persons professing the Christian religion should consist wholly of persons professing the Christian religion. But this latter restriction was abolished by 2 and 3 Will. 4, Cap. 117, section 2. By this last-mentioned Statute also, the Governor General in Council was authorised to appoint any person, resident within the territories in the possession and under the Government of the East India Company, and not being a subject of any foreign State, to act as a Justice of the Peace within the towns of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay.

The above is a brief summary up to the year 1872 of the history of the laws relating to the exercise of jurisdiction in criminal matters over European British subjects residing in India. Now it seems to me that they do not establish the existence of the privilege which has been claimed for them. There was no disability arising from nationality to a British Indian subject to fill the office of a Judge of the Supreme Court at Calcutta; and although by section 87, 3 and 4 Will. IV, Cap. 85, it was declared that no native of British India should, by reason of his religion, place of birth, &c., be disabled to hold any office under the East India Company, I have not been able to find any previous Statute by which such disability had been declared or created. At any rate, it is beyond all dispute that, since the passing of the aforesaid Statute, a native of British India was not under any disability to enter the Covenanted Civil Service of the East India Company; and, as a member of the Covenanted Civil Service, he was eligible to be appointed a Justice of the Peace. It is true that unless he was a Covenanted Civil Servant, he could not act as a Justice of the Peace out of the limits of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. But his eligibility to be appointed a Justice of the Peace was declared in the year 1832, and the experience of the last fifty years, I believe, would warrant the proposed removal of this restriction as to the local jurisdiction.

In criminal trials, in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, all British Indian subjects residing within Calcutta were, as shown above, competent to act as Jurors whatever might be the nationality of the accused person.

From 1853 to 1861, a Native Deputy Magistrate, vested with the full powers of a Magistrate, could take cognizance of complaints against a European British subject for offences mentioned in section 105 of 53 Geo. III, Cap. 155. From 1861 to 1872, a native member of the Covenanted Civil Service, if vested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace and exercising the full powers of a Magistrate, could also deal with these cases.

Therefore it is clear that, since the commencement of the British Rule in India, a European British subject has not enjoyed the privilege of being tried by a Judge who is also a British subject.

This privilege or the right was, for the first time, conferred upon him under Act X of 1872, so far as the Criminal Courts in the interior of the country are concerned.

With reference to the second question stated above, it seems to me that the apprehensions entertained by those who oppose the proposed Bill are not founded on any tangible basis. They do not appeal or refer to any known fact or condition of things reasonably justifying their apprehension.

On the other hand, if the facts gathered from past experience be made the basis of our conclusion,—as legitimately they should be—it would at once appear that there exists no reasonable ground for the supposed apprehension.

The facts to which I refer here are—

- (1) That the jurisdiction has been exercised by Native Judges from 1836 in civil cases in which European British subjects are concerned, without any complaint from them.
- (2) That the jurisdiction in criminal cases against European British subjects has been exercised by Native Judges in the Presidency Towns for many years past, without any defect in the administration of justice.
- (3) That the administration of justice by European Judges in criminal cases in which natives are concerned has been regarded by the people as wholly satisfactory.
- (4) That the administration of justice by a Judge of one nationality or creed in a case in which one or both litigants happen to be of another nationality or creed has not been found to be productive of failure of justice.

I shall notice next some of the arguments which have been advanced against the force of these facts. It has been said that civil suits differ in many essential respects from criminal cases. The result of an erroneous decision in the former affects generally the property of the unsuccessful litigant, while the result of a similar error in the latter affects the personal liberty and the reputation of the unfortunate accused person.

No one can for a moment deny the existence of this distinction. But it does not in the least affect the force of the argument under consideration. That argument is that a Judge, who is proved to have successfully grappled with questions of law and fact in a given civil suit, may be fairly presumed to be competent to show the same result in a criminal case also. The difference in the result of an error of decision in the two cases does not at all touch the force of this reasoning. Its force rests upon the ground that the facts to be investigated and the laws to be discussed are not of a different class, whether they arise in the decision of a civil suit or a criminal proceeding. The respective consequences of an erroneous decision have no sort of connection with this proposition.

The usual answer given to the argument drawn from the past administration of criminal justice by Native Magistrates in the presidency towns is, that there is a vast difference between the conditions of things existing there and those existing in the interior of the country. In the presidency towns, it is said, an accused person has the protection of a vigilant Press, a strong public opinion, and an easily available legal assistance, while such advantages do not exist in any appreciable degree in the mofussil. It is also said that the concoction of false cases is almost unknown in the presidency towns, while, in the interior of the country, trumping up of false charges is one of the commonest means of wreaking one's vengeance upon his enemy for a real or a supposed wrong.

It is certainly questionable whether, in the present state of things, it is correct to say that the advantages of a vigilant Press, a strong public opinion, and an efficient and easily available legal assistance are not enjoyed in an appreciable degree by the residents in the mofussil. But I shall not dilate upon this matter. I shall take it for granted that in these respects a Presidency Town differs from a mofussil station. Assuming that this difference exists between the two places, let us see what the argument really amounts to. Does it not amount to this—that in the presidency towns, being under the salutary check of the forces mentioned above, a Native Judge dare not go wrong willfully? This argument therefore casts an unjust aspersion on the character of the Native Judiciary—an aspersion which, if put to the test of actual facts, can be proved to be utterly groundless. In civil cases, in which European British subjects have been concerned, if the Native Judges have proved themselves to be fair, honest, efficient, and careful officers, is it not unjust to presume that in criminal cases they would prove themselves to be just the reverse? The argument drawn from the absence of a vigilant Press, &c., is, I presume, equally applicable to civil as well as to criminal cases.

I shall next notice the other alleged difference in the conditions of things between presidency towns and the interior of the country, viz., the prevalence in the one, and the absence from the other, of the concoction of false cases against innocent persons. I shall assume, in this instance also, the existence of the difference. I suppose that those who advance this argument mean to say (although I have not seen it stated in so many words) that these cases are generally supported by perjured native witnesses. It would be no disparagement to the European Judges in this country (for whose ability I have the highest respect) to say that an honest Native Judge, by his superior knowledge of the character of the people, will be better fitted than his European colleagues to unravel the mazes of concoction and discover where the truth lies.

Then it has been said that the habits, manners and customs of the natives of this country are, in all respects, essentially different from those of Europeans. It cannot be expected from Native Judges, therefore, that, in cases in which European British subjects would be concerned, they would be able to form a correct opinion as to the real motives of an action of the accused person, if the motive of such action be a relevant matter for enquiry.

To this argument all the four facts, set forth above, afford a complete answer. I shall not further refer to Nos. 1 and 2, as their bearing has been sufficiently explained. But Nos. 3 and 4 contain, I believe, a more forcible refutation of this argument.

It may be safely asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the knowledge of European Judges of the habits, customs, and manners of the natives of this country is not in any degree superior to that of Native Judges, with fair English education, regarding European habits, customs, and manners.

The administration of criminal justice in the most important cases is now in the hands of European Judges. If the European Judges have been found to be successful in the administration of justice in the cases in which natives are concerned, there is every reason to hope that those Native Judges who would be entrusted with jurisdiction over European British subjects would acquit themselves with equal credit. I do not mean to say that the existence of a defect in the present system of administration of justice can justify the introduction of another defect of a similar nature. But what I mean to say is, that there is no ground for complaint against the present system, and it is therefore reasonable to hope that there would be no ground of complaint if the proposed change in the law be carried out.

Native Magistrates have hitherto exercised jurisdiction in criminal cases in which European British subjects are complainants. If they have given satisfaction in these cases, there is every reason to hope that there would be no failure of justice in cases in which European British subjects would be accused with the commission of an offence.

Of the European and Eurasian population in the interior of the country, I believe the descendants of the Europeans who do not come within the definition of European British subjects given in the Criminal Procedure Code form by no means an inconsiderable proportion. These persons in criminal cases have been, hitherto, subject to the jurisdiction of ordinary tribunals. No complaint has been made of any failure of justice in the hands of Native Magistrates, in cases in which persons of this class have been tried for offences alleged to have been committed by them. Their habits, manners, and customs are, in all essential respects, similar to those of the Europeans. This fact furnishes the most cogent refutation of the argument under consideration.

In conclusion, I desire to make one observation as to the provisions of the Bill itself. Under section 22 of the Code, as it stands now, any European British subject may be appointed a Justice of the Peace. Accordingly, a European British subject having the powers of a Magistrate of the first class, when appointed a Justice of the Peace, is competent to deal with cases in which European British subjects are accused with offences triable by a Magistrate. It is proposed to take away the power of the Government to appoint a judicial officer of this class to be a Justice of the Peace. The object stated for this proposed change is to remove judicial disqualification based merely on race distinctions. The same object may be gained, without taking away this power, by extending the operation of section 1 of the Bill. But, if it be thought inexpedient to extend its operation, I would venture to say that the object stated does not, in my opinion, warrant the proposed change so far as this class of officers is concerned.

On behalf of the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association, I beg to forward, for submission to His Excellency the Viceroy, the accompanying memorial of certain European British subjects and others residing in India against the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill.

The memorial bears 11,783 signatures.

Dated 9th June, 1883.

To His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council.

The humble memorial of the undersigned European British subjects and others, residents in India.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That by the existing law for the administration of criminal justice in British India, European British subjects charged with the commission, without the local limits of jurisdiction of the High Courts of Judicature of Bengal, Madras, Bombay and Allahabad, and of the Chief Court of Judicature of the Punjab, of offences against the criminal law, are entitled to be tried on such charges in the above-named High Courts or Chief Court, in case of offences punishable with death or transportation for life, and by European Judges and Magistrates in case of offences not so punishable; subject, nevertheless, to the proviso that such Magistrates shall not have power to sentence European British offenders to imprisonment exceeding three months, and that such Judges shall not have power to sentence them to imprisonment exceeding one year, but that they shall transfer to the High Courts for trial all cases in which they consider one year's imprisonment to be an inadequate punishment.

2. The right of British subjects in India to be tried by Judges being themselves European British subjects is not of recent introduction, but coeval with the establishment in this country of British Courts of criminal judicature; criminal jurisdiction over all persons subject to their rule was conferred by the Charters of 1661 and 1669 on the Governors and Councils of Madras, Bengal, and Bombay, who were constituted Courts of Oyer and Terminer, and the territorial limits of whose jurisdiction were defined by the Charters of 1726 and 1753. The jurisdiction of the Governors' Courts was transferred, in Bengal, to the Supreme Court at Fort William, established in 1774 under Statute 13 Geo. III., c. 63, with criminal jurisdiction over all British subjects in Bengal, Behar and Orissa, and in Madras and Bombay to the Recorders' Courts established in those towns in 1797 under Statute 37 Geo. III., c. 142, with criminal jurisdiction over all British subjects residing within the factories subject to, or dependent upon, the Governments of those provinces. The last-mentioned Courts were themselves replaced by, and their criminal jurisdiction over British subjects was vested in, the Supreme Courts established at Madras in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823, under the Statutes 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 79, and 4 Geo. IV, c. 71, respectively.

3. The criminal jurisdiction over British subjects of these several Courts, whose Judges were themselves British subjects, was extended by various enactments to the new territories acquired from time to time by the East India Company.

4. The Charter of 1726, and the Acts and Charters under which the Supreme Courts were created, constituted the Governors and Councils of Madras, Bengal, and Bombay, the Governor General and the Members of his Council, and the Judges of the Supreme Courts, Justices of the Peace; but as these provisions were found insufficient for the due administration of justice in regard to offences committed by British subjects at a distance from the Presidency-towns, and in order to facilitate the commitment of such offenders for trial, the Statute 33 Geo. III, c. 52, empowered the Governor General in Council to appoint Justices of the Peace "from the covenanted servants of the East India Company, or other British inhabitants," to act within the provinces and Presidencies of Bengal, Madras and Bombay, and places subordinate thereto, and a later Statute, 47 Geo. III, c. 68, conferred on the Governors in Council of Madras and Bombay similar powers within their respective Presidencies in supersession to that extent of the above-mentioned powers of the Governor General in Council, but with the like restrictions as to the persons who might be appointed to act as Justices of the Peace outside the Presidency-towns. The powers thus conferred have been confirmed and extended to the Local Governments established in India since the dates of these Statutes by various Acts of the Indian Legislature, the last of which, being the existing Code of Criminal Procedure, was passed on the 6th of March 1882. Every one of these Acts prescribed that only European British subjects should be appointed Justices of the Peace outside the Presidency-towns. Native members of the covenanted civil service have, it is true, been appointed Justices of the Peace in pursuance of powers supposed to be given by Act II of 1869, but such appointments, your Memorialists submit, are in violation of the express language of the Act, identical in this respect with the words of the Statutes above-mentioned, and which clearly indicates that the civil servants appointed thereunder shall themselves be British inhabitants. Down to the 6th of March, 1882, therefore, the Indian Legislature fully recognised the inexpediency, to use no stronger expression, of conferring on Natives outside the Presidency-towns even so limited a jurisdiction as that of committing European British subjects for trial. In the Presidency-towns, where such powers were exercised under the direct supervision of the British Government and the watchful control of a large European community, where the Supreme Court was a criminal Court of Oyer and Terminer and where immediate redress for a wrongful commitment was obtainable, the same necessity for Native disqualification did not appear to exist; and accordingly the Statute 2 and 3 Wm. IV, c. 71, authorised the appointment, as Justices of the Peace for such towns, of any persons resident within the Company's territories without distinction of race. Considerations of a similar character seem to have prevailed in the occasional appointment of Natives of India to the magistracy of the Presidency-towns. Such appointments, however, have by no means proved a success, even in Calcutta. One of the first Native Presidency Magistrates, appointed in 1856, was dismissed or removed for gross judicial misconduct in 1858. No Native was, in consequence, appointed for twenty-one years afterwards; and although within the last few years Natives have been again appointed, yet the Bengali Magistrates have in many respects failed to discharge their duties as satisfactorily in public opinion as the European British incumbents of the office.

5. The criminal jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts over European British subjects was transferred to the High Courts established at Calcutta, Madras and Bombay in 1862, and at Agra in 1865, under the Statutes 24 and 25 Vic., c. 104, and 28 Vic., c. 15, and, as regards the Punjab, to the Chief Court of that province created by Act IV of 1866. Natives of India are made eligible to the benches of these several Courts. But the policy of their appointment is in some measure safe-guarded by the fact that the judicial duties of such Native Judges are discharged subject to the immediate control of their British colleagues, the check of a large, independent and vigilant bar, the criticism of an able and enlightened European Press, and the powerful influence of the collective educated opinion of the numerous British residents in the Presidency-towns.

Moreover, no Native Judge has hitherto sat in any of the High Courts singly to exercise original criminal jurisdiction over Europeans, but Native Judges have only sat as members of a Court of Appeal with European colleagues. Under Act XXI of 1863, a Recorder's Court was established at Rangoon with criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects in British Burma in respect of all offences not punishable with death, jurisdiction in the case of capital offences being reserved to the Calcutta High Court. The only statutory qualification for the Recorder's office is that the Judge must be a barrister of not less than five years' standing. It must be remembered, however, that when this Act was passed there was no Native barrister in India, and only one practising in England. No Native, as a matter of fact, has ever been appointed Recorder, and your memorialists submit that it was not in the contemplation of the Legislature that such an appointment ever could be made, and that therefore no special provision was deemed necessary.

6. The exclusive criminal jurisdiction over British subjects of the Courts established by Royal Charter continued till 1812, when the Statute 53 Geo. III, c. 155, empowered Zilla Magistrates (who were Justices of the Peace and therefore Europeans) to try British subjects for petty assaults or injuries accompanied with force committed on Natives at a distance from the Presidency-towns, and to punish such offenders by fine not exceeding Rs. 500, or, in default of payment of the fine, by simple imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months. The criminal jurisdiction of the Company's Courts over European British subjects outside the Presidency-towns was never further extended.

7. On the 24th of January, 1857, Mr. (now Sir) Barnes Peacock, then Legal Member of the Legislative Council of the Governor General, moved the first reading of four Bills (framed by the Indian Law Commissioners appointed under the Statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 85) "for extending the jurisdiction of the Courts of criminal jurisdiction of the East India Company in Bengal, Madras, Bombay, and the North-Western Provinces, for simplifying the procedure thereof, and for investing other Courts with criminal jurisdiction." These Bills provided that no person whatever should, by reason of place of birth, or by reason of descent, be in any criminal proceeding whatever excepted from the jurisdiction of any of the criminal Courts. The Select Committee, however, to whom these Bills were referred for consideration, were of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Mofussil Courts in regard to the trial of European British subjects ought not to be extended, an opinion in which the majority of the Council concurred. But the Council went still further, and, on the 3rd of September 1859, at the instance of Mr. Peacock himself, inserted a clause which provided that "no person should be empowered by Government to hold a preliminary enquiry into cases triable by any of the Supreme Courts of Judicature, or to arrest, hold to bail or commit any European British subject, unless the person so authorised be a covenanted servant of Government or a European British subject." It must be borne in mind that no Native of India had at that time been admitted as a covenanted servant of Government, the result, therefore, of this clause was to exclude Natives from all criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. In consequence of the enactment of the Indian Penal Code, it became necessary to refer these Bills back to another Select Committee, but the principle of Native disqualification, which had been thus deliberately adopted, was in no wise abandoned in the measure which was ultimately passed into law as Act XXV of 1861. The criminal jurisdiction as regards European British subjects of the Courts established by Royal Charter was left untouched by this Act, and, save so far as it was affected by the creation of the Recorder's Court at Rangoon and of the Chief Court of the Punjab, that jurisdiction continued unchanged till 1872.

8. On the 17th of December 1870 a Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to the procedure of Criminal Courts of Judicature not established by Royal Charter was introduced into the Legislative Council of India by Mr. J. F. Stephen, then Legal Member of Council, and was referred to a Select Committee. This Bill, as originally framed, did not touch the jurisdiction of the Charter Courts. On the 16th of December 1871, Mr. Stephen informed the Council that "the Select Committee had received a large number of opinions from the Local Governments and persons connected with the administration of justice in reference to the Bill, and amongst others they had received a most important paper from the Government of Bengal. That paper contained a suggestion that European British subjects should be made to a great degree amenable to the ordinary criminal Courts of the country." A reference to the paper alluded to shows that the Bengal Government advocated such an extension of jurisdiction to the Mofussil Courts on the express ground that these Courts were presided over by British officers. Upon a consideration of the suggestion so made, the Select Committee, after informally ascertaining the feeling of the non-official classes, recommended, with respect to the jurisdiction over European British subjects,—

"(a) The extension of the jurisdiction of Magistrates being Justices of the Peace, and, in the case of Mofussil Magistrates, European British subjects, to try European British subjects for offences which would be adequately punished by three months' imprisonment or fine of Rs. 1,000.

"(b) That Sessions Judges, being European British subjects, should be empowered to pass sentence on European British subjects of one year or fine, but that, in case of European British subjects pleading guilty or accepting the Sessions Judge's jurisdiction, the Court might pass any sentence provided by law for the offence in question.

"(c) That a European British subject convicted by a Justice of the Peace or a Magistrate should have the right of appeal either to the Court of Sessions or the High Court at his option.

"(d) That, in every case in which a European is in custody, he may apply to the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus, and the High Court shall thereupon examine the legality of his confinement and pass such orders as it thinks fit."

9. On the consideration by the Council of the Select Committee's Report, Sir Barrow Ellis moved that jurisdiction over European British subjects should be conferred on Native Magistrates of the first class being Justices of the Peace (that is to say, Native members of the covenanted civil service who had been admitted by competition in England, and whom he thought sufficiently Europeanised to be treated as Europeans); but the motion was negatived on a division of the Council after full and deliberate discussion, and the Bill modified according to the recommendations of the Select Committee, was passed on the 25th day of April 1872, as Act X of that year. The proposal to invest Native Magistrates with criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects evoked on every occasion strong opposition from the non-official European community; and the question of conferring such jurisdiction was not again raised in Council until the present year, notwithstanding the pregnant fact that Act X of 1872 was passed (? amended) in 1874, and that the whole law relating to the jurisdiction and procedure of the criminal Courts in India (including the Courts established by Royal Charter) was re-moulded by Act X of 1882. This last measure was framed in consultation with all the Local Governments in India, and professed to embody the ripe conclusions of ten years' deliberation. While it was pending before the Legislative Council, officials interested in the administration of criminal law were invited to criticise and report upon it, and upwards of one hundred and fifty reports from officials, among whom were a number of Natives, besides criticisms from the different Local Governments, were received in answer to that invitation. Among these were fifteen reports from High Court Judges, thirty-two from Sessions, Additional and Assistant Sessions Judges, fifty-seven from District Magistrates, four from Presidency Magistrates, thirty-two from Commissioners of Divisions, seven from Judicial Commissioners, six from Chief Commissioners, five from Inspectors-General of Police, besides others from Deputy and Assistant Commissioners of Police, Small Cause Court Judges, Munsifs, Residents in Native States, and law officers of Government. Not one of these reports or criticisms, so far as your Memorialists have been able to ascertain, except one dated the 9th September 1879, from the then Officiating Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, a Native not belonging to the covenanted civil service, advocated the abolition of the existing rights and privileges of European British subjects. With these reports and criticisms before the Legislative Council, it was deliberately resolved in 1882 that it was neither just nor expedient that European British subjects should be rendered liable to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction by Native Magistrates outside the Presidency-towns.

10. Notwithstanding the fact that Act X of 1882, which purported to deal exhaustively with the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, came into force only on the 1st of January 1883, yet, on the 9th of February 1883, a Bill to confer criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects without the Presidency-towns upon Native Magistrates and Judges being members of the covenanted civil service of India or of the Native civil service constituted under Statute 33 Vic., c. 3, or being uncovenanted Session Judges, or uncovenanted Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates, was introduced by the Legal Member, Mr. Ilbert, into Your Excellency's Council and is now under consideration by that Council.

11. That from the discussions which have already taken place in such Council on the said Bill, and from the published official papers relating thereto, it appears that sanction was obtained for the introduction of the Bill from the Secretary of State for India in Council, and that confidential opinions had been obtained from the Local Governments in favour of some criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects being conferred on Native members of the covenanted civil service. It further appears that the Chief Commissioner of Coorg and the two Senior Members out of the four who compose the Madras Council are opposed to such a measure, and that the Government of Bengal was not consulted on the subject; such omission being justified as in accordance with ordinary practice, the measure having originated in a suggestion made by Sir Ashley Eden, the late Lieutenant-Governor, shortly before his departure from India. In view of the fact that the European population of Bengal far exceeds that of any other Presidency, it is, your Memorialists venture to think, to be regretted that, before the introduction of so important a Bill, steps were not taken to ascertain the opinion of the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and his judicial and magisterial officers, and also the opinions of the Chief Justice and Puisne Judges of the High Court of Bengal. It is, your Memorialists feel, matter for yet graver regret that no endeavour was made to ascertain the opinions and sentiments of the non-official European community, who were to be specially and peculiarly affected by the provisions of the Bill, with regard to a measure the principle of which that community had on all previous occasions condemned, and the re-introduction of which has led to a strong and general agitation and awakened profound feelings of indignation and distrust.

12. The effect of this Bill is to disqualify all Europeans not in the covenanted civil service and not being Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates from being Justices of the Peace, that is, from trying or committing Europeans, and to render eligible in their place (a) Native members of the covenanted civil service chosen by competition in England (of whom there are only nine in all India); (b) members of the new Native civil service nominated in India without competition and without going to England; (c) Native uncovenanted District Judges; (d) Native uncovenanted Assistant Commissioners; and (e) Native Cantonment Magistrates (should any such be appointed).

13. Your Memorialists should observe that there is no statutory qualification for the office of Assistant Commissioner or Cantonment Magistrate, and nothing to prevent such offices from being filled entirely by Natives who are not covenanted civil servants; that almost all the tea grown in India is grown in districts under the criminal jurisdiction of Assistant Commissioners; and that there are more than one hundred of such officials in India.

14. Your Memorialists have been led to enquire into the origin of this astounding proposal, and find that it is the result of a compromise arising from differences of opinion of Your Excellency's Executive Council.

15. It appears from a despatch of the Government of India to the Secretary of State for India, dated the 9th September 1882, that a minority of the Council were in favour of the views expressed by Sir Charles Aitchison in a confidential communication, dated the 5th August 1882, that "the restriction introduced by the Code of Criminal Procedure upon the powers of Courts to enquire into and try charges against European British subjects, which (rest?) exclusively on race-distinctions, are invidious and unnecessary;" that is, that all exemption of Europeans in the interior or Mofussil should be swept away, that no person should be exempted from the jurisdiction of any criminal Court in India, and that any Native officer who has power to try a Native for any offence and to pass any sentence upon him should have power to try a European for the same offence and to pass the same sentence upon him.

16. It appears from the same despatch that the majority of the Council declined to accept any such sweeping proposal.

17. It appears further that the Government of India did not think it worth while to legislate unless they could remove from the Statute-book all trace of what they term "race disqualification of Judges;" and, therefore, so far as your Memorialists can gather, as the majority of the Council refused to get rid of the "race disqualification" by qualifying the ordinary uncovenanted Native official, it seems to have been suggested that the desired symmetry in the Statute-book might be produced, and the anomaly got rid of, by disqualifying all the uncovenanted European officials (other than European Assistant Commissioners and Cantonment Magistrates), against whose efficiency and fitness there has never been any complaint, and who under the existing law are qualified to exercise criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects.

18. This curious compromise appears to have been adopted, and the present Bill seems to have been introduced to give effect to it, without the smallest attempt to ascertain the feelings of non-official Europeans, or to consider the outcome of this wholesale European disqualification.

19. The principle embodied in the measure is supported by arguments based on the so-called anomalous character of the present law, on the alleged invidiousness of the disqualification attaching to Native judicial officers, and, lastly, on certain administrative difficulties stated to have resulted, or as likely to result, from such disqualification.

20. It cannot be contended as a valid or reasonable argument that the right of European British subjects in India to be tried on criminal charges by Judges of their own race is open to any serious practical objection by reason of its special and limited character. In a country like India, subject by right of conquest to the dominion of an alien people, inhabited by numerous races of different origin and different creeds, swept as it has been by successive tides of foreign invasion, which have left behind them peculiar and exclusive privileges, as the hereditary rights of particular classes and special individuals,—where immutable laws of caste, surviving the shock of contending systems and accepted as divine by millions, have during countless ages circumscribed the sphere of individual action and defined gradations of rank dependent on birth alone, and which are neither to be won by merit nor purchased by wealth, until the very idea of equality has come to be regarded by a vast body of the population as a grave sin against the divine inheritance of birth, where too the avowed principle of British policy has hitherto been the conservation, so far as possible, of every existing right, whether founded on the fragmentary remains of ancient laws, or on the prejudices of religion, caste, or social customs,—in such a country and under such existing anomalous systems your Memorialists feel justified in urging that there is no special or unreasonable anomaly in the existence of the right now sought to be taken away, and that the anomaly, if such it can be called, must be sought for in the person of the Judge, and not in the conditions under which he is permitted to exercise jurisdiction. That a Native Magistrate, however much it is to be regretted, should ever have been invested with special jurisdiction over European British subjects within the Presidency towns, whilst he was excluded from the exercise of a like jurisdiction outside such Presidency-towns, is in no way anomalous to those who have even a limited experience of the social conditions, privileges, and prejudices existing in India, and can only appear anomalous to those who are ignorant of the distinctive circumstances under which these judicial and magisterial powers are exercised. All such anomalies, if such they be, must remain as inseparable constituents of the paramount anomaly of all, namely, the existence, in fact, of the supremacy of British rule in India.

21. The arguments based on the alleged injustice of the so-called judicial disqualification of Natives to try European British subjects on criminal charges are hardly worthy of serious consideration. They assume the existence of some right, inherent or conferred, which has been wrongfully invaded. Your Memorialists venture to submit that there cannot be a right to try Europeans existing in Natives, any more than there is a right in Englishmen in England to try peers of the realm for treason and felony.

22. Your Memorialists are at a loss to discover in which of the countless races of India this alleged right is supposed to exist. If in the heterogeneous mass of the Native races of India, then it may be well pointed out that their various social systems are entirely founded on the recognition of special rights and peculiar privileges. It can hardly be permitted, therefore, to any Native, of any race, creed or nationality, to argue that the existence of the right which the European British subject now enjoys in this respect is to be condemned because it is a peculiar race-protection. Your Memorialists would contend that, even were its maintenance claimed on no higher grounds than sentiment or prejudice, its existence could not afford a legitimate grievance to those whose personal laws have been expressly secured to them by British legislation, and in deference to whose social prejudices, allowed to override the requirements of impartial justice, their females who live or claim to live in seclusion, and their men of rank and position, are exempted from appearing in British courts of justice as witnesses. The special exemption of European British subjects has been recognized by the most thoughtful Natives as a requisite protection and as necessary for the employment of European capital in India. And your Memorialists confidently assert that the exclusion of European British subjects from the criminal jurisdiction of Natives has never formed a ground of complaint with the Native populations of India as a united body. The want of homogeneity amongst the Native inhabitants of India, antipathies of creeds, inequalities of caste, the mutual distrust and jealousies of different tribes, the profound and unqualified contempt felt and expressed by the brave and hardy races of the North-West and of the Central Provinces for the Bengali, from whose ranks the Native covenanted civil servants are chiefly drawn, all combine to prevent the possibility of such a complaint.

23. The argument in this particular of invidious race-disqualification, which your Memorialists venture to think owed its origin entirely to European official inspiration, is confined to a few semi-Anglicised Natives and the limited class of youthful agitators whom they are enabled to influence. Even viewing, for the sake of argument, the subject of jurisdiction as a mere question of feeling, still your Memorialists venture to deny the justice of sacrificing the feelings of the whole European community in India to the vanity of a few Native officials, or to the aspirations of a small uninfluential class of the Native population of Lower Bengal. And since, in support of their supposed claim to criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects, it is urged that Native civil servants appointed by competition in England (a class which will form but a very small proportion of the entire Native covenanted civil service) by their education and by their residence in England have become thoroughly imbued with English ideas of justice, your Memorialists are justified in presuming that they have also arrived at a sufficient appreciation of the principles underlying the British system of trial by a man's own peers to regard their personal disqualification as no greater insult to their ability or integrity than a British juror would deem the demand of an accused alien to be tried by a mixed jury. The so-called disqualification of Native members of the covenanted civil service to try Europeans is really not a disqualification of the Judge, but a privilege of Europeans to insist on being tried in a Court presided over by a European, and it affects equally uncovenanted, as well as covenanted, Native officials. It would be as reasonable to speak of the privilege of Europeans to demand a jury composed one-half or more of Europeans as a disqualification of Native jurors.

24. So far as the alleged right is supposed to exist in the Native members of the covenanted civil service, its existence rests on the assumption that the admission of Natives to that service involves the promise that they shall be allowed to exercise every power which may be conferred on their European colleagues, and that their selection for any particular office necessarily implies their fitness to discharge all functions ordinarily appertaining thereto; and it has been urged that the continuance of race disqualification is repugnant to the spirit of Imperial legislation, which by Statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 85, declared that no Native subject should, by reason only of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour or any of them, be disabled from holding any place, office or employment, under the East India Company, and also of Her Majesty's Gracious Proclamation in 1858, announcing Her will that, as far as may be, Her subjects, of whatever race or creed, should be impartially admitted to offices in the service of the Crown, the duties of which they might be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity duly to discharge. But the guarded language of the Statute and of the Proclamation reserved all questions of political expediency; and the admission of Natives to the covenanted civil service afforded no grounds for the assumption that in respect to the Natives so admitted no such questions could possibly arise.

25. The existing law sufficiently provides for the appointment of Natives to all offices of emolument, even to those of District Judge and District Magistrate, and obviates all inconvenience arising from the right of Europeans within their jurisdiction to be tried by a European Judge or Magistrate, by making provision for the transfer of such cases to another Court, or, as it is termed in England, for a change of the venue; and it should be borne in mind that these cases are admitted to be rare by the mover and the supporters of the Bill.

26. Your Memorialists crave permission to point out that, in admitting Natives to the new statutory civil service of India, the Government has evinced a tender anxiety to avoid wounding all alien susceptibilities, even such as exist between the various Asiatic races of India inter se. In the notification gazetted on the 22nd of August 1879, it is stated that each Local Government is empowered to nominate certain Natives of India for employment in the civil service within the territories subordinate to such Local Government. It is, however, specially provided that Natives so admitted to the civil service shall be ordinarily appointed only to office in that province where they were first appointed; thus affirming the wise principle that it would be unjust and inexpedient to subject the Natives of one province to the jurisdiction of Natives of a different province, save only under the pressure of some exceptionally (sic in orig.) State requirement. The wholly repugnant customs and prejudices of Western and Eastern races infinitely increase the danger and injustice of subjecting European British subjects to the criminal jurisdiction of Native judicial officers.

27. Your Memorialists would humbly urge upon Your Excellency the grave objections which exist to empowering Natives in the Mofussil to try Europeans, on the ground of their unfitness to exercise such power.

28. Your Memorialists would further urge upon the consideration of Your Excellency that serious discontent may be engendered among European troops by Natives being rendered eligible for appointment as Cantonment Magistrates, and that, even if it be assumed that the Government will never exercise the power of appointing Natives to act as Cantonment Magistrates, but will continue, as heretofore, to appoint Europeans only to such offices, still a Native District Magistrate would be entitled at any time, under section 528 of Act X of 1882, to withdraw any case from any Cantonment Magistrate within his district and to try such case himself.

29. The social system of the Native inhabitants of India, the seclusion of Native ladies in the zenana, the backward state of Native female education, prejudices of caste which make the Hindu regard contact with the European as contamination, and the bigoted character of the Muhammadan creed, prevent all possibility of free and unreserved intercourse between the European and Native communities, and the consequent growth of any real sympathy between them. In the absence of such sympathy, the Native Judge, however honourable and high-minded he may be, cannot properly appreciate the motives of European conduct, and is therefore incapacitated from forming a correct judgment on the natural presumptions of European actions. Moreover, whereas the European inhabitants of India have some security for the just and honest discharge of judicial duties by a fellow-countryman whose character and modes of thought have been moulded under a religious and moral system and domestic and external influences identical with, or similar to, those under which they have themselves been reared, and whose present actions continued to be governed by influences of the same character, in the case of Native Magistrates no such guarantees exist. It is impossible to believe that a few years of early manhood passed in England, or the intellectual training which these Magistrates may have undergone, can possibly suffice to change their whole moral nature, or to eradicate the ideas of right and wrong in which their childhood was trained, and which regulate the actions and sentiments of that society to the influence of which they are again subjected on their return to India. It is contrary to experience to believe that in so short a period they can have succeeded in stifling every prejudice of caste or race, or in emancipating themselves from the subtle influences of domestic and popular sentiment by which they are surrounded, and to which they have been subjected from early youth.

30. The domestic and social institutions of the Natives of India, whether Muhammadans or Hindus, based as they are upon a system of polygamy combined with female seclusion, have been developed on lines so opposed in the most essential particulars to those of Europeans, and have engendered as their necessary and indissoluble correlates such opposite habits, feelings and ideas, especially in matters concerning the relations and mutual conduct of the sexes, and all the incidents of such relations and conduct, as to render Natives of India wholly incompetent to estimate correctly or even intelligently the significance of facts connected with them, and consequently incompetent to arrive at just conclusions regarding them. The effect of the proposed measure would, therefore, be to transfer criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects in an important class of cases affecting the domestic happiness and peace of the parties concerned, from men who, by community of institutions, feelings and ideas, are competent to form correct conclusions, to men who, however honest they may be, must necessarily, from the absence of such community of institutions, feelings and ideas, be incapacitated from arriving at even intelligent conclusions concerning them.

31. That not only would serious risk thus arise of great injustice and misery being inflicted on innocent persons, but grave scandal and injury to the reputation of European British subjects would be created.

32. Your Memorialists further desire to point out that, owing to the disgrace which attaches in Native estimation to the appearance of respectable women in open Court, a feeling from which your Memorialists believe no Native is entirely free, an Englishwoman placed for trial before a Native Judge would encounter an unavoidable prejudice in his eyes, and thus be placed at a serious disadvantage; while in the eyes of the more ignorant spectators of her disgrace she would be covered with obloquy, to the injury of her self-respect and of the esteem of the Natives around her.

33. So great is the contempt in which the Muhammadan and Hindu Natives of India hold the female sex, that an Englishwoman brought before a Judge of either of these races to be tried for a criminal offence would be thereby subjected to a special indignity of the most galling kind, and one to which it would be in a high degree inhuman, unjust, and impolitic to expose her. A knowledge of this circumstance would furnish a dangerous temptation to Native dependents and others to persecute Englishwomen with false charges for the purposes of extortion and intimidation.

34. Not only are Europeans in the interior of the country isolated in the sense of being solitary units in the midst of tens of thousands of an alien race, but, by reason of difference of language, habits and feelings, and the absence of common ties and sympathies, they are also morally and socially isolated from the Natives around them. In consequence of this isolation, they stand at an insuperable disadvantage in respect of the means of combating, or even ascertaining the existence of, conspiracies to bring false charges against them, or of rebutting the evidence brought forward in support of such charges; and the only counterpoise to this disadvantage which they possess is the right of being tried by European British subjects, of which right the Bill would deprive them.

35. That the necessary protection which the European British subject now has against false charges, which constitute the common weapon of offence and annoyance amongst the Natives of India, which protection partly depends upon the feeling which such charges inspire in the mind of the British Magistrate, and partly upon the just severity of the punishment he awards to the offender, will be materially impaired, if not completely destroyed, when such charges can be preferred with comparative impunity before a Native Magistrate, who would regard them as the ordinary incidents of legal warfare and the natural weapon of the weak against the strong, reprehensible possibly, but still to be dealt with leniently and as of no great consequence, specially when directed against Europeans in the interior. It is well to remember, also, that the Native Press is for the most part antagonistic to Europeans, and generally takes a prejudiced view in all those cases in which there is a conflict, either criminal or civil, between members of the two races. It is only natural to suppose that Native Magistrates will in some degree be biased by the expressions of opinion published in these papers.

36. Moreover, throughout the greater portion of India where European British settlers gather no strength from numbers, but live isolated from their fellow-countrymen, their exemption from the criminal jurisdiction of Native Magistrates has invested them in the eyes of the Natives by whom they are surrounded with a certain prestige, which in itself affords no little protection against the danger of false accusation. But, as the foundations of such prestige become undermined, and Europeans are lowered to the same level as that on which their accusers stand, they will necessarily be deprived of this protection also, and will be subjected to still more frequent harassment in this manner; and not only will the danger to themselves be thus materially increased, but their influence for good on the Native population in whose midst they live will be proportionately weakened.

37. It has been stated that the jurisdiction which Native Judges have exercised for many years in civil cases in which European British subjects may be concerned affords a conclusive answer to those who oppose the investment of Native Magistrates with criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects, that the objections and fears which are now expressed are identical with those expressed in 1836, and that time has shown the apprehensions then entertained to have been groundless. As regards the two latter statements, your Memorialists would point out that the agitation of 1836 was an agitation against the extension of the jurisdiction of the Company's Courts over British subjects, and was not specially directed against the investment of Native judicial officers with such jurisdiction; on the contrary, the leaders of Native society in Calcutta allied themselves in 1836 with their British fellow-subjects in opposing the extension of jurisdiction which was then contemplated. The fears then expressed have been in a great measure justified by events, and, so far as they may have been falsified by time, this has resulted only in consequence of the whole constitution and system of the Company's Courts having been subsequently altered. Your Memorialists, moreover, while abstaining from entering on an examination of the merits and defects of Natives as Civil Judges, deny that the exercise of civil jurisdiction by Native Judges affords an adequate, or indeed any, guarantee that Native Magistrates will exercise criminal jurisdiction over Europeans in a satisfactory manner. The conditions under which the two kinds of jurisdiction are exercised differ in every material particular. The very nature of a criminal complaint, the police agency by which evidence in its support is so frequently obtained, the character of the evidence itself, and the difficulty in many cases of disproving it, the position of the accused on his trial, his imperfect acquaintance with the vernacular language, and the legal liabilities to which he is subject before as well as after trial, all tend to place criminal proceedings on a wholly different footing from a civil action, and to displace any arguments in favour of the Bill attempted to be founded on past experience of the manner in which civil jurisdiction has been exercised by Native Judges. It is to be remembered also that a system of bribery is rampant throughout India, that the Native police are in very many instances excessively venal and corrupt, and that the promotion of the Magistrates and the police is to some extent dependent upon their record of conviction.

38. The administrative difficulties anticipated from a continuance of the so-called disqualification of Native Covenanted Civil Servants are, as your memorialists allege, difficulties of a purely visionary and theoretical character. There are at present not more than nine Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service selected by competition in England. Only two of these are of sufficient standing to be affected by the measure, and for several years to come not more than four or five can possibly come within its operation. But, even were their numbers far larger, there are numerous districts in India without a European resident, where the judicial functions of the Native Magistrate can be utilised without danger or fear of offence to any member of the community, and where his official dignity will not be wounded by the exemption of a single individual from his jurisdiction. In addition to this consideration there remains the fact that there is no district in India without at least one European magisterial officer. Moreover, in Bengal, where the Bill must admittedly have the most extensive operation, your memorialists have the public assurance of the present Lieutenant-Governor that no administrative difficulty will be felt.

39. Somewhat inconsistently with arguments founded on such supposed administrative difficulties, it is urged that the Bill will confer criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects on only a few Native officials, and that the removal once for all of all judicial disqualification dependent on birth alone carries with it an element of finality, and surprise is accordingly affected at any opposition to a measure which is said to rest on principles of natural justice, which will effect so small a change, and which cannot be further extended. The alleged finality of the measure is delusive, and the arguments founded on natural justice find their logical conclusion in the abolition of every distinctive right and privilege which the European British subject now enjoys, and, amongst others, those which the Bill has advisedly left untouched, the Courts by which he can be tried, the punishments they may inflict upon him, the mode of trial, his right of appeal, and his right to be brought before the High Court if wrongfully detained in custody. The principle of perfect equality, once admitted as paramount to every other consideration of State, would gain its crowning result in a Native Viceroy and a Native Commander-in-Chief.

40. As to the disqualification of all Europeans not being Covenanted Civil Servants, Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates, your memorialists would remark that, so far from conducing to the better administration of justice, it will produce great practical inconvenience. At present, there are in Lower Bengal alone forty Uncovenanted European Deputy Magistrates with first class powers who are Justices of the Peace and have power to try Europeans, which powers it is admitted that they exercise satisfactorily and efficiently. These forty will not be affected by the Bill. But there are a large number of Europeans in the Uncovenanted Service who, as they attained first class powers, would have been made Justices of the Peace, and would have been authorised to try, as a matter of course, Europeans charged with petty offences. The Local Governments, if this measure passes, will be debarred from using the services of these men in their respective sub-divisions for the prompt and speedy adjudication of European cases, and such cases will have to be transferred to some Court presided over by a covenanted civilian; thus creating an absolutely gratuitous inconvenience, having no shadow of justification except the removal of an alleged anomaly, which is only one of numerous anomalies of the same description which the Government have determined to retain.

41. Your memorialists would point out that the Native statutory civil service, which it is proposed to substitute for the disqualified Europeans, is comprised of a new and comparatively untried class; that it will be many years before any member of that service will be senior enough to be invested with first class powers or to be made a District Judge or District Magistrate, so as to be empowered to try Europeans; that its members are chosen by nomination in India, not by competition or in England; that they are usually selected on account of the social position or influence of their families; and that they have been described in one of the confidential communications to Government, by the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, as often "saturated with caste and religious prejudices and ignorant of European modes of thought and feeling," and not to be trusted to "hold the scales fairly." Your memorialists humbly submit that it cannot be for the interests of justice to disqualify experienced European Uncovenanted Deputy Magistrates, who are admittedly fit and efficient, and to substitute for them as Criminal Judges over your memorialists such a class as this.

42. Your memorialists would further point out that European Master Attendants have hitherto been constituted Justices of Peace in various ports in India, and have been found of great use in dealing with English and foreign sailors; and that in the interior a large number of non-official Europeans have been appointed Honourary Magistrates and Justices of the Peace, and as such have rendered valuable assistance to the Government in the administration of justice. It is now proposed, with no cause assigned therefor, to disqualify all such Europeans from being appointed Justices of the Peace. The Bill, therefore, so far from being an enabling Bill, as it has been termed by its supporters, is practically a disabling Bill of a very sweeping character, and is entirely destructive of an important existing machinery of British administration in India.

43. The administrative working of the proposed measure, moreover, will lodge the Government of India in the following extraordinary and mischievous cross anomaly, that a large and increasing number of Europeans will be for the future unqualified to act as Justices of the Peace, and will therefore be incompetent to try European British subjects, although the Government will still have power to appoint them Honourary Magistrates with jurisdiction to try Native offenders; whilst, on the other hand, in the place of this disqualified class, Natives will be eligible to act as Justices of the Peace with the power of exercising criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. If the Indian Government desire to remove any anomaly in the administration of criminal justice, it would surely have been wiser to have left to Europeans a criminal jurisdiction, naturally exercised over European British subjects, and to have confined Native Magistrates to a like jurisdiction over their Native fellow-subjects.

44. Your memorialists submit, moreover, that the right of European British subjects to be tried on criminal charges by European British Magistrates and Judges has infinitely stronger claims on justice than rest on sentiment alone, and is based on principles of policy which are inseparably bound up with the welfare of India and the prosperity of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, Native as well as European. Your memorialists claim that the preservation of that right is essentially expedient; for in no country is confidence in the administration of justice, and especially of criminal justice, more essential to the well-being of the community than it is in India, which owes to British capital and energy the recent rapid development of her natural resources, as illustrated by the railway system and the abnormal growth of tea, jute, coal and other industries—industries which contribute in so important a manner to the marked prosperity of her people, and which in years of scarcity or famine support millions of her Native inhabitants, who but for such support would perish miserably. Your memorialists regard the right to be tried by European judicial officers as a safeguard which has been of the utmost value to them in the past while initiating enterprise in the mofussil, and which will be essential to them in the future for the prosecution of those enterprises by which India has so much benefited; and your memorialists are anxious to impress upon Your Excellency that the enormous European capital which is already invested, and which is about still further to be invested, will assuredly seek other channels if British capitalists and their employés are forced to lose confidence in the Criminal Courts of the land by which they have hitherto been, partially, at all events, protected from persecution and aggression.

45. Your memorialists desire to remind Your Excellency that the British Government has been always careful to protect British subjects in Oriental countries from trial by Oriental tribunals. They fail to understand why this protection, which has been so universally and invariably accorded hitherto, should now be withdrawn in India, and they desire, moreover, to impress upon Your Excellency that the right which they seek so jealously to maintain is simply a protective right, and is in no sense capable of being construed as an invasion of the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Native subjects of Her Majesty in India. The grievous loss which they will sustain will bring no kind of compensatory gain to their Native fellow-subjects.

Your memorialists therefore humbly pray that Your Excellency will take into consideration the facts and arguments set forth in this their humble memorial, and that upon such consideration Your Excellency will deem it inexpedient and hurtful to the prosperity and welfare of the Empire to deprive your memorialists of their existing rights and privileges, and be pleased to direct the withdrawal as soon as possible of the Bill now before Your Excellency's Council, by which it is proposed to take away such rights.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

No. 494, dated 21st June, 1883.

From—LIEUT.-COLONEL E. R. C. BRADFORD, Chief Commissioner, Ajmer-Merwara,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 32C., dated 17th March, calling for opinions upon the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, and, in reply, beg to submit my own opinion on the subject, and with it appendices containing the opinions of the following officers serving in Ajmer-Merwara :—

Mr. L. S. Saunders, Commissioner of Ajmer-Merwara ;
 Mr. J. R. Fitzgerald, Assistant Commissioner, Ajmer ;
 Mr. E. J. Kitts, ditto ditto ;
 Mr. T. C. Pears, ditto Merwara ;
 Pandit Bhagam, Judicial Assistant Commissioner, Ajmer.

2. As the law now stands, except in the Presidency-towns, no European British subject is amenable to the jurisdiction of any Magistrate or Justice of the Peace or Sessions Judge who is not himself a European British subject. The Bill provides that the exemption shall be removed. It makes all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ex-officio Justices of the Peace, and empowers the several Local Governments to appoint the last-mentioned office—

- (a) any member of the Covenanted Civil Service, European or Native ;
- (b) any member of the Native Civil Service instituted under the Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3 ;
- (c) Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, European or Native ;
- (d) Cantonment Magistrates ; provided that all persons so appointed shall have been previously invested with the powers of a Magistrate of the first class. Under the Bill, the Local Governments will no longer be competent to appoint to the office of Justice of the Peace any European British subject, unless he belongs to the Covenanted Civil Service, or is an Assistant Commissioner in a Non-Regulation Province, or a Cantonment Magistrate.

3. The object of the Bill, as described in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, is to remove all race distinctions. It is apparently designed to give full effect to the idea embodied in section 87 of the Act of William IV (3 & 4, chapter 85), which enacts that "no Native of the said territories (British India), nor any natural-born subject of His Majesty resident therein, shall, by reasons only of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour, or any of them, be disabled from holding any office or employment" under the Government of India.

4. The Bill has met with very strong and general opposition from the English unofficial community in this country. It has been supported by some, indeed by the majority of the Local Governments, but it has been opposed by the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and a few other officers of high standing. In the Legislative Council of the Governor General, the case against the Bill has been forcibly urged, not only by the non-official English members, but also in a very able speech by a Madras Revenue Officer and Magistrate of long experience ; and it is generally understood that the objections which have been urged against it by the leading representatives of non-official English opinion, both in the Council of the Governor General and at public meetings, and in the English Press, are shared in by a large majority of the English officials throughout the country. I have reason to believe that, amongst the officers employed in this Agency, the majority deprecate the proposed legislation.

5. Having given my best consideration to the Bill and to the correspondence and discussions which have taken place with reference to it, I feel bound to say that the arguments against the measure are full of force and difficult to controvert. It must, of course, be admitted that the Statute of William IV from which I have quoted, and of which the substance was repeated, though with a slight modification, in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, raises an argument against maintaining in our laws any disabilities founded upon distinctions of race, which is theoretically very strong ; and the argument is strengthened in the case of the Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, who, having won their appointments at an open competition, have grounds for regarding themselves as eligible for any office or for any duty which is open to the English members of the Civil Service. The case of Native officials appointed under the Statute of 1870, and that of Native Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, are, I think, less strong; but even in these cases, if the declaration embodied in the Statute of William IV were to be carried out to the full extent which the language used implies, there would doubtless be a difficulty in maintaining the distinctions which the Bill proposes to remove. But, as a matter of fact, the declaration in question cannot be acted on to the full extent of its literal significance. There will always be offices in India which, so long as British rule is maintained, must be reserved for members of the ruling race. It is not too much to affirm that under no conceivable circumstances will any Native of India, however eminent, be selected by Her Majesty's Government or by the Governor General for the chief administrative post in an Indian Presidency or Province, or as the chief representative of the Government of India at the Court of any of her principal Native feudatories.

6. It is perhaps to be regretted that this patent fact was not borne more carefully in mind by the framers of the statute; but, however this may be, the fact remains that, beyond a certain point, the language of the statute must be regulated quite as much by political considerations as by considerations based upon mere legal qualifications. This would seem to have been the view taken by the late Lord Lawrence when issuing the Resolution of the 19th August, 1867, where reference is made to the circumstance that "Natives entrusted with administrative duties have a difficulty in dealing with independent Europeans," and Local Administrations were required to frame their proposals for "opening up to Natives of ability and character a more important, dignified and lucrative sphere of employment" in the administration of British India, "with due regard to the expediency of providing English officials for all districts in which European settlers or travellers abound."

Again, in the despatch from the Duke of Argyll, under date the 8th April, 1869, the principle is emphatically asserted that "it is one of our first duties towards the people of India to guard the safety of our own dominion, and that for this purpose we must proceed gradually employing only such Natives as we can trust, and these only in such offices and in such places as, in the actual condition of things, the Government of India may determine to be really suited to them."

7. I must submit that these instructions have an important bearing upon the question involved in the Bill now under consideration. I should be disposed, however, to deal with that question from a somewhat different point of view, and to treat it rather as a question of retaining or withdrawing certain personal privileges and immunities hitherto enjoyed by persons of a particular class in their capacity as private individuals, than as a question of the rights and claims of officials; and, treating the question from this point of view, it appears to me that there is nothing invidious in continuing to European British subjects in the Provinces the exemptions from the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Judges in criminal cases, which has hitherto been accorded to them. In a country in which Native gentlemen of high rank are constantly exempted from appearing as witnesses before the Civil Courts, and in which a similar exemption is granted to Native women of certain classes not necessarily of high rank, I can perceive nothing invidious, nor indeed anomalous, in maintaining a law which continues to Englishmen and women a time-honoured exemption from the criminal jurisdiction of Courts presided over by Native Judges and Magistrates.

8. I would add that I do not believe that the exemption in question has been hitherto regarded by the great body of the Natives as a grievance; and I am persuaded that, if the Bill is passed, many very excellent Native judicial officers will regard the powers entrusted to them with dismay rather than satisfaction. It must not be forgotten that in some infusill stations the exercise of the jurisdiction of a European Justice of the Peace over Englishmen charged with offences against the criminal law, where none but Native constables are available, is not always free from difficulty. That difficulty will be greatly increased when the Justice of the Peace is a Native; and there are many Native gentlemen, whose opinions are valuable, who fully recognize this fact.

9. The excitement and agitation among the English community which the publication of the Bill has aroused have, it cannot but be feared, emphasized race jealousies and antipathies which it will take time to allay, and with these feelings has arisen a factitious demand, especially on the part of some of the Natives possessed with a certain degree of English education, and in the Native Press, for the concessions offered in the Bill; but I have no doubt that, if the Bill is withdrawn, and if it is seen that the Government are resolved to abide by the settlement of the question arrived at in 1872, any soreness which may have been produced by the heated discussions of the last few months will gradually pass away.

10. It has been argued, in support of the Bill, that, if not at once, in the course of a few years, when full effect shall have been given to the rules passed under the Statute of 1870, administrative convenience will require that Native Judges and Magistrates shall be invested with the powers it is now proposed to confer upon them. I cannot think that this argument is well-founded. It appears to me that, with the rapid extension of railways which has gone on of late years and is still proceeding, there will be no practical difficulty in arranging for the trial of the few European British subjects who come before the Criminal Courts in the Provinces, even when the full number, namely, one-sixth, of the appointments of those grades shall have been filled by Natives; provided always that the rule laid down by Lord Lawrence in 1867, of providing English officials "for those districts in which European settlers or travellers abound," shall be observed.

11. On the important question of the fitness of Natives to exercise criminal jurisdiction over Englishmen, I do not doubt that, in many cases, perhaps in most, justice would be efficiently and impartially administered in ordinary times by Native Judges and Magistrates, but I apprehend that, in times of excitement and in cases where caste-prejudices or religious prejudices were concerned, it is not so certain that a Native judicial officer, serving in a remote district, might not be influenced by motives and sentiments which it is very inadvisable to call into action. In a case, for instance, in which the accused was a Christian missionary, I can conceive a state of things in which it would be difficult to repose implicit confidence in the impartial action of even the most eminent Native functionary. The argument advanced in the debate in Council with reference to the ignorance of Natives of English family life and of English ways and manners is also, I think, deserving of serious consideration. Should it, however, be decided to introduce the proposed change into our criminal procedure, I would recommend that the measure be partially and locally applied. There may be certain parts of India where the division of class-feeling will be less real than in others; and I would propose, therefore, that discretion be given to Local Governments to declare certain areas to be scheduled districts for the purposes of the proposed amendment. I think it possible that the discretion which the Bill already gives to Local Governments will be calculated to give rise to invidious distinctions. Every first class Native Magistrate will regard the powers of Justice of the Peace as the final test of his fitness; and, should these powers be not given from reasons quite sufficient in the eyes of the Local Government, there will nevertheless be the feeling among Native Magistrates that their qualifications are not cordially recognised. The discretion to which I have above referred should be given to the larger Local Administrations, while, for the purposes of a small Administration, like Ajmer-Merwara, it would be well if the Government of India declared it to be a scheduled district.

12. With regard to the effects of the measure on the people it will concern in Rajputana, I see reasons for recording my dissent from the proposed change. It seems to me that one of the primary duties of the British Government is to secure peace between the naturally conflicting races of India. We are, from time to time, met with the danger which is always present in the race-antipathies of Hindus and Mussulmans. We have here in Rajputana in the railway population a class which cherishes an ignorant antipathy to Natives generally,—an antipathy which is most warmly reciprocated. This most deplorable fact is due to many causes. The Europeans in the railway have no opportunities of mixing with superior Natives. Their lives bring them into contact with those of a low social standing and, I fear, of low morality. The European on the railway sees speculation rife, and sees the Native official hard and cruel towards Natives; "ex uno disce omnes" is the natural process of thought in the minds of Europeans in the class I refer to; and the European employé consequently regards the Native generally as separated from himself by a very sharp race distinction.

13. Though it may sound paradoxical, I believe that, until these two classes have been brought to a better understanding of one another's good qualities and inherent weaknesses, the removal by artificial means of this race-distinction will but give fresh activity and bitterness to the antipathies which already exist. It is true that European officials and Natives of position are fitfully brought together, sometimes with the happy result that prejudices and misunderstandings are removed; but up to the present no such attempt has been systematically made to bring Europeans of lower grades and Natives of a similar rank together, and, until this much-desired object is attained, I would recommend that legislation be postponed.

In my opinion, the necessity for amending the Criminal Procedure Act, 1882, has not as yet been satisfactorily established; without such necessity there seems to be a general consensus of opinion that the Bill should be dropped. In that opinion I concur. Speaking of my own charge, however, it is true certainly that we have once or twice, for short periods, had only Native Magistrates in Merwara; but the ease with which travelling is now effected in India has never made it troublesome or difficult to arrange for cases in which Europeans are concerned to be tried before a European Magistrate, and I believe the time is far distant when any such practical difficulty will be seriously felt anywhere in India; for I hold it as extremely improbable that for many years to come we shall see any large tract of country entirely officered by Natives, for the following reasons.

2. There is scarcely a city or bazar in India, I believe, where there is not a latent element of serious discord existing between the factions of Hindus and Muhammadans; and, had not the utmost tact and impartiality been continuously employed in dealing with these cases, this discord might break any moment into a flame which would only be quenched by the exhibition of considerable power. This fact renders it essentially desirable, in my opinion, to keep a European officer at the head of the affairs of each district. Believing this to be an occasion on which an officer who has been many years in India (and has carefully watched Native society, and finds this feeling increasing as education spreads rather than diminishing) (sic), I feel bound openly to state my conviction, honestly and truthfully, however unpalatable it may be, so that there shall be no misunderstanding my meaning, and that our rulers, who are not brought so directly in contact with Native society as we are, shall not blindly believe that these race and religious animosities are buried and forgotten, because they are so seldom allowed to break out and speak for themselves. Instances could easily be given which would show how soon an outbreak of this character would occur if either a Hindu or Muhammadan Magistrate was at the head of affairs. To ignore such cases is, I believe, as serious a political mistake as it is to make too much of them; but that they exist and are an ever threatening danger must, I think, be fully recognized and acknowledged.

3. The higher executive posts, such as Magistrates of the district, must, at all events in by far the majority of districts, therefore, I believe, be held by European officers; in fact, if a time ever comes when a large proportion of Natives are ready to step into these posts by right of their position or standing in the service, it will be found necessary to place some arbitrary limit on the number of districts in each province to be held by such persons; and, though I have always been an advocate for admitting Natives freely to all but the higher executive posts under our Government, I think we should act more honestly if we were at once to announce the fact that there are certain posts which we by right of our position (as aliens and conquerors of the country) declare a Native not to be eligible for. It is far better to do this now, when such posts are not asked for or claimed as a right by Natives, than to have to do it when some of these posts have been so held, than to wait till it has become apparent that this distinction between the races must be recognized.

4. Education has in the last 20 years made enormous strides, and these strides will doubtless be continued in mathematical proportion during the next 20 years, and it is essentially necessary that careers shall be opened out for this mass of educated men. An educated Native is, I believe, intellectually the equal, if not often the superior, of an ordinarily educated European, but an intellectual Native, however well educated he be, without the moral training and feelings inherent in most educated Europeans, is not well fitted to try even a male European criminally; but when it comes to be a question of trying a female European, can it be asserted that he is fitted to perform this duty properly and efficiently?

5. Any European in India who knows the estimation in which Natives hold the ladies of their own families cannot but answer this question in the negative; and I firmly believe that there is scarcely one Native Magistrate (even after he may have visited England) who could understand the position, and therefore do real justice to any European lady who might be so unfortunate as to be placed before him for trial. If, therefore, there was no other reason for considering the present amendment of the Code premature, I would submit that this alone would be sufficient reason to show that the time has not yet arrived, nor is it likely soon to arrive, when this Bill should be introduced, and can be accepted with safety to the general community.

6. That the Native Magistrates might, in all ordinary instances where men are concerned, be able to dispose of these cases satisfactorily, I will not deny. I know many Native Magistrates who would do so, and who would generally err on the side of leniency to Europeans I believe; but our law must be not only a fair weather law, and it is under extraordinary cases of class-feeling, where the weakness and instability of their character (owing to a want of thorough conscientiousness based on religious principles) would affect their judgment, and prove that the necessary discrimination, and unswerving honesty of purpose, which we look for in a judge as above all other requisites, is wanting, though it is undoubtedly true that the judicial branch of the service, as being the one in which rules and laws are most exactly laid down, is the branch of work in which the Native particularly excels.

7. If, notwithstanding all arguments that have been adduced by the opposers of this measure, it be still held that there is a practical necessity for proceeding with this Bill, I think a compromise should be sought for; and the only compromise which will be satisfactory to all concerned is that the prisoner should have the option of either being tried by the Native Magistrate or by an European officer. This is no novel proposal. Already the European on his trial before a Magistrate and Justice of the Peace has an option, under section 408 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to appeal either to the Sessions Judge or the High Court; and I would extend this option in cases of trial obliging the Native Magistrate to commit to a European Court, if trial before him were objected to; in petty cases, or where much inconvenience to witnesses, or detention of the prisoner, was likely to take place, the European prisoner would probably waive his right, and the trial could proceed before the Native Magistrate if he was a fit and capable man; otherwise the prisoner would demand to be committed to a higher Court, and this right should at least be secured to him.

Dated 17th April, 1883.

To—The Commissioner, Ajmer.

If there is one principle which more than another has characterized our Government of India during the past ten years, and which must be further developed in the future, it is the more extended employment of the Natives of the country in almost every branch of the public service. I do not purpose to discuss whether the policy is a wise one. Personally I believe it to be so, but I wish to lay stress on its existence, and on the fact that its adoption has materially affected the question of giving Natives of India jurisdiction over European British subjects since the matter came up for discussion in 1872. In that year proposals similar to those in the present Bill were rejected in the Council of His Excellency the Governor General by a bare majority. Since then the doors of both the Covenanted and the Uncovenanted Services have been opened wider to the Natives of India. It is probably not too much to say that, where there was one in 1872, there are now five Natives of India who have a reasonable expectation of rising to the position of District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, and this number must constantly and steadily increase. It can hardly be doubted that, in a few years, the introduction of some such Bill as that now before us will become not merely a matter of justice and policy but an absolute and imperative necessity.

Were it not for remarks which have been lately common in the Press and on the platform, it would seem hardly necessary to refer to the question whether carefully selected Natives of India are qualified to exercise the exceedingly limited and well-guarded powers with which it is proposed to invest them. We have seen them filling with ability and credit the high position of a High Court Judge; in every district in India they are deciding civil cases which involve property of large extent, or rights and privileges which are held dearer still than property. But I am not aware that they have ever been accused of any race partialities in cases where Europeans and Natives are antagonists.

It is still harder to believe that a Native Judge is less qualified than an Englishman to pronounce on the value of Native evidence or to detect perjury in Native witnesses.

To put the case on the lowest and most unworthy grounds, I believe that those who will be invested with these powers, being men of education and intelligence, will thoroughly recognise that they are on their trial, and, knowing that in these days of improved communications there is no corner of the Indian Empire so remote as to prevent an unjust decision prejudicial to an Englishman being brought into the fierce light of public opinion, will not dare to yield to any temptation of corruption or race bias.

The experience of the Presidency-towns strengthens the belief that Native Magistrates will exercise the proposed powers with discretion, and that miscarriage of justice is not more likely to become more common than it is at present.

The one direction in which they may be expected to fail is (as has lately been observed by a distinguished writer in the English Press) that possibly their decisions may be characterised by a want of courage.

The present measure has been framed with caution, and may be regarded as, in a great degree, tentative. If the worst apprehensions of the opponents of the Bill are fulfilled, it will be open to the Government to cease appointing Natives to the office of Justice of the Peace. If, on the other hand, the measure is now dropped, the time will assuredly come when it will not be possible to further delay the settlement of this question. Native opinion will almost certainly demand measures more extended than the present proposals, and as certainly they will be more fiercely opposed. If the measure could be quietly and permanently shelved, it would not be easy to advise proceeding further with it in the face of an opposition which, however exaggerated, unreasoning and deplorable, is without doubt real and widely spread. If we disregard the future, then I admit that the necessity for the alteration in the law is not urgent, but I have tried to show that, if the question be now laid aside, it must recur in a few years under circumstances which will make it far more difficult to deal with.

Although I believe that the passing of the proposed Bill into law is to be recommended on the lower grounds of political expediency, I think a few words should be said from the point of view of justice and consistency. Can it be right that we should do all we can to encourage higher education in the Natives of India and induce them to study the latest phases of modern thought and intellectual development, offer them responsible posts in the service of the State and make them Collectors, Sessions Judges, Judges of the High Courts, giving them, in a word, powers of life and death over their countrymen of full blood, and yet deny them the right to fine a drunken Eurasian? The desire to remove this blot appears to me to be something more than the weak sentimentality which it is represented to be by the opponents of the Bill.

Macaulay wrote in 1837 of the Sadr Court: "If it is fit to administer justice to the great body of the people, why should we exempt a mere handful of settlers from its jurisdiction? That distinction seems to indicate a notion that the Natives of India may well put up with something less than justice, or that Englishmen in India have a title to something more than justice. We proclaim to the Indian people that there are two sorts of justice—a coarse one which we think good enough for them, and another of superior quality which we keep for ourselves."

These words appear to me to apply mutatis mutandis with much force to the present situation.

No. 128 C., dated 9th April, 1883.

From—LIEUT. T. C. PEARS, Assistant Commissioner, Merwara,
To -The Commissioner, Ajmer-Merwara.

My opinion is that no amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, is at present required, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

No. 567, dated 12th June, 1883.

From—E. J. KITTS, Esq., Assistant Commissioner, Ajmer,
To—The Commissioner, Ajmer-Merwara.

I have the honour to acknowledge your No. 683G., forwarding for opinion a Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. I have known tolerably intimately several Native gentlemen who might be affected by section 1 (c) of the Bill, and from their relations with official and non-official European subjects who were their neighbours and with whom they were brought into frequent contact. I believe that the Bill, if passed, would work well, and that any apprehensions which at present exist would soon be allayed. At the same time I admit that, with all the non-official European British subjects referred to, the Bill was unpopular.

3. It seems, however, to me evident that the Bill may suit one part of India or one part of a Presidency or even one part of a district and not necessarily suit another, at any rate until some years later. I would prefer, therefore, to increase the discretion allowed to Local Governments in such a way as to empower them to restrict the local area within which the powers conferred under section 22, Criminal Procedure Code, can be exercised; an appointment might then be made with reference to a single town or a single taluq.

Note by BHAG-RAM, Judicial Assistant Commissioner, Ajmer, dated 27th April, 1883.

So much has already been said in newspapers, and in the Gazette of India, on the subject, that I hardly think an elaborate opinion is required.

The Bill has undergone a thorough criticism, and has given rise to a controversy between Anglo-Indians and Natives which is very much to be regretted.

The principal objections urged against the measure may be briefly summarized as the following:—

I.—That the Bill at once deprives Anglo-Indians of a privilege which they have enjoyed since the advent of British rule in India.

II.—That it subjects them to the jurisdiction of the members of a conquered race, whose status and social position are inferior to those of the conquerors.

III.—That Native Magistrates are not properly qualified, by reason of their defective knowledge of English and their ignorance of European habits and manners, to try cases against European British subjects.

On the other hand, it is alleged in favour of the Bill that it removes at once, and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions.

Any opinion expressed by a Native of India on the provisions of the Bill must naturally be a vindictive one, and place the writer in the anomalous position of an adversary attempting to disprove the disqualifications and imputations alleged against the race to which he belongs.

I have no intention of assuming that position, and would content myself with the remark that, irrespective of any statements made by either party, the British members of Indian administration are the only judges competent to determine this unfortunate question. They can, without any great amount of trouble or inconvenience, ascertain from their personal experience whether the Bill is likely to do any good or mischief, and whether race distinctions in these days of mental and social development should be allowed to form a barrier against the eligibility of Natives, otherwise qualified and competent, to discharge the important duty which they are intended to discharge.

An opinion coming from that quarter would be the best and most valuable opinion, affording ample materials for a sound judgment on the suitability or otherwise of the measure.

There is no doubt that India has undergone a material change for the better under the benign influence of British rule.

Recall the times of Muhammadan rule, when, suffering under a foreign yoke, the rigours of laws framed and exercised by an unprincipled and tyrannical class of rulers, the people of India were reduced to a state of utter demoralisation, ignorance and imbecility; and compare them with the results brought about by British rule.

No one can deny that the conquest of India by the British was not a conquest for the sake of plunder and devastation. It was admittedly a conquest in the cause of humanity—a conquest which had for its main objects the development of trade and the natural resources of the country, and the raising of the status of its people to a point more elevated than that sung by the Indian bards of antiquity.

How England has performed its mission does not require any great amount of investigation or research.

Under the paternal and fostering care of the British Government, the people of India have enjoyed all the benefits of a wise and impartial administration, their moral and intellectual powers have fully developed under the influence of Western science and thought, and they, who in Muhammadan rule were labouring under a long list of disqualifications and legal disabilities, are now eligible for important and high offices in the administration.

It is one of the moral principles of British law—nay, it is the pride of the British nation—that in the eye of the law all are equal. Disqualifications based merely on race distinctions are legally no disqualifications; and, if at one time they were allowed as a matter of political or administrative necessity, they must as a natural consequence cease when that necessity no longer exists.

If I am not mistaken, I am only quoting what has been emphatically declared by competent judges of Native character and ability, that at the present moment, when Natives are eligible for the appointment of High Court Judge, Sessions Judge and District Magistrate, the anomaly of excluding at particular class from this jurisdiction should undoubtedly be done away with.

I fail to understand why Anglo-Indians should vehemently oppose the measure, which is a natural outcome of English magnanimity and generosity.

If England had used the people of India like slaves, denied to them the boons of administration on a par with Anglo-Indians and effected all that was necessary to check their moral, physical and intellectual development, there would have been no occasion for the measure now brought forward; but, when, to all intents and purposes, it has acted generously and magnanimously, it should congratulate itself on the occasion when the people of India are just enabled to reap the harvest which, by the fostering care and industry of the ruling Power, has been brought to perfection.

Coming to the general question of ability, and an honest discharge of duty by Native Magistrates in the disposal of cases against Europeans, it may be safely asserted that the fears entertained by the opponents of the Bill are entirely groundless. Native Presidency Magistrates have not in any instance abused the exercise of their jurisdiction over European British subjects. Civil cases by and against Europeans are daily decided by Native Judges, without affording the least cause for complaints. Criminal cases, in which the complainants and witnesses are Europeans, are tried by Native Magistrates, and I have not heard of any miscarriage of justice brought about by a spirit of race antagonism, or by the incapacity of the Magistrate to sift the evidence or form a judgment regarding the demeanour and credibility of the witnesses produced before him. A Judge or Magistrate who fails to discharge his legal functions is not qualified to sit on the bench at all. Why, then, should fears be entertained regarding the conduct and capability of Native District Magistrates and Native Sessions Judges in the most trifling cases not sufficiently clear?

Considering the limited scope of the Bill, there is every reason to hope that only the most competent and qualified Native gentlemen will be called on to try European British subjects, and there is no doubt they will acquit themselves honourably and creditably.

No. 884, dated 19th June, 1883.

From—C. J. LYALL, Esq., C.I.E., Officiating Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam,
To—The Secretary to the Government of India, LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

On receipt of your Circular No. 30C., dated 17th March 1883, copies of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code were forwarded to the Judges of the Assam Valley and Sylhet, and to all Deputy Commissioners of the Province, with a Circular letter, a copy of which is enclosed. The replies of all officers thus consulted have now been received, and I am desirous to submit copies of them to the Government of India, together with an expression of the Chief Commissioner's opinion regarding the Bill.

2. The Provincial Officers are, it will be found, in every case opposed to the Bill, and unanimously recommend its withdrawal. As their replies will, no doubt, be perused in their entirety, it is not necessary to enter on any elaborate summary of their contents, but it will be convenient to indicate as briefly as possible the nature of the arguments recorded.

- (1.) Mr. Ward, Commissioner and Judge of the Assam Valley Districts, would not have opposed the conferment of the powers of Justice of the Peace on Native Covenanted Civilians when they rose to the rank of District Magistrate or Judge, and does not think such a proposal would have excited much opposition at first, though it cannot be adopted now in the present state of public feeling. But he objects to the Bill on the ground that the privilege hitherto enjoyed and highly valued by Europeans should not be taken away without grave reason, whereas no serious inconvenience can be alleged to arise anywhere from the present state of the law, and no inconvenience at all is felt in Assam. He holds that no strong Native feeling exists on the subject outside the Native official class, and they have no reason to feel slighted; and, further, he objects to the power given to Local Governments to appoint, because it would be exercised in very different ways—sparsely here, liberally there.
- (2.) Mr. Muspratt, Judge of Sylhet, opposes the Bill on the grounds—(a) that in removing one anomaly it creates another by its circumscribed application to particular classes, and its disqualification of European Deputy Magistrates and non-officials; (b) that Europeans, who are the persons most affected, are convinced that they would not get justice from Natives, and their feelings should be respected; (c) that it is inopportune in time, because of the mental disturbance caused by the Local Self-government Scheme, and other important measures now pending, and because the European and Native races are not yet amalgamated in feeling or on a par in intelligence.

- (3.) Mr. Johnson, Deputy Commissioner of Sylhet, objects both to the details of the Bill,—i.e., the distinction drawn between Covenanted and other classes, and the disqualification of European Uncovenanted Officers,—and to its principle, on the ground that race-distinctions cannot be ignored and that the conquered cannot love the conquering race. He considers the arguments for and against equally feeble, and, that being so, thinks the Bill should be withdrawn.
- (4.) Mr. Wight, Deputy Commissioner of Cachar, holds that the powers of a Justice of the Peace might gracefully be given to Covenanted Civilians and to any Native who had reached the grade of District Magistrate, but that it would be inopportune to do so now; that all Natives, other than these, are unfit by prejudice and want of education to try Europeans; that it would be inexpedient to bring European ladies into the Court of a Native Magistrate, either as witnesses or otherwise; that Native Magistrates do not wish for these powers, and would be afraid to convict Europeans if they had to try them, so that the result of the measure would not tend towards justice; that no administrative difficulty is caused by the present law; and that an anomaly is not necessarily objectionable in India, which swarms with anomalies.
- (5.) Mr. Driberg, Deputy Commissioner of Goalpara, thinks the Bill good in principle, but desires its withdrawal on account of the hostility with which it has been greeted.
- (6.) Mr. Campbell, Deputy Commissioner of Kamrup, holds that there are no sufficient grounds for introducing the Bill, which is met by universal hostility; and that the privileges of Europeans should be respected as much as if they were Hindus or Muhammadans, who would resent the withdrawal of any of their present privileges.
- (7.) Mr. Williams, Deputy Commissioner of Darrang, objects to the conferment of the powers on Classes (b), (c), and (d) of the Bill, but not to their conferment on Class (a),—at any rate as far as the persons hitherto appointed to that class are concerned. But he thinks the Bill, generally speaking, to be unnecessary and bad, and as it is bitterly opposed, he recommends its withdrawal.
- (8.) Colonel Lamb, Deputy Commissioner of Nowgong, thinks the hostile tone of the Native Press proves that the class to whom the new powers would be given are not fit to receive them; that Europeans would be overwhelmed with false accusations; and that it does not follow that because Natives have been found able to try Natives, they should be able to try Europeans.
- (9.) Colonel Campbell, Deputy Commissioner of Sibsagar, holds that a Native Magistrate cannot understand the feelings, or in many cases the speech, of Europeans, and that Europeans would be worried by false cases. Race distinctions cannot be ignored as long they exist.
- (10.) Major Peet, Deputy Commissioner of Lakhimpur, is opposed to the whole line of policy of which the Bill is a part, i.e., the tendency to put the races on an equality by levelling up or levelling down; and further holds that, whether bad or good, the Bill should be abandoned on account of the unprecedented excitement it has awakened.
- (11.) Mr. McCabe, Deputy Commissioner, Naga Hills, approves only the extension of powers to Class (a) of the Bill. He objects to it as unimportant, and states that non-official Europeans feel hostile to Natives and think all Native Magistrates dishonest.
- (12.) Colonel Clarke, Deputy Commissioner, Khasi and Jaintia Hills, thinks the Bill impolitic and unnecessary. Anomalies must exist in India; and this one can only be remedied some time hence, when the two races have been amalgamated in thought and feeling.
- (13.) Captain Maxwell, Deputy Commissioner, Garo Hills, opposes the Bill on the ground that Englishmen are better capable than Natives of judging Europeans, and this is a substitution of the worse for the better. He thinks that Europeans will not, after the agitation of the last few months, submit to be tried by Natives.

3. These replies are written with the frankness and independence which the Chief Commissioner anticipated, and which become the character of the gentlemen who have written them. Much as he disagrees with some of the opinions, the Chief Commissioner would not have wished them to be in any respect modified, or to be anything but the genuine expression of the views of the writers; and he is satisfied that the Government of India will share this feeling. Something has been said in the course of the controversy which has raged over the Bill, about the subservience of Government officers to the known wishes of the head of the Government. Mr. Elliott is glad to record his belief that he has not an officer serving under him who, when asked for his opinion on any subject, would not give free and unbiassed expression to it regardless of the views entertained, or supposed to be entertained, by higher authority; and who, if that opinion was overruled and the question decided against him, would not loyally and cheerfully carry out the orders he might receive.

4. I am now to submit the Chief Commissioner's own opinion about the Bill.

5. First, with regard to the details of the Bill. It will be remembered that the proposal originally circulated was to give the power of trying European British subjects to Covenanted Native Civilians, either before or when they have attained the position of a District Magistrate or Judge; and Mr. Elliott, in my reply, recommended that such powers should be given to Native Covenanted Civil Servants on the same terms as to their English compeers, and to Statutory Native Civilians when they had attained the rank of District Magistrate or Judge, but dissuaded the Government from abolishing altogether the race-distinction between European and Native Magistrates, as a step for which the time is not yet ripe. The Bill has gone far beyond that recommendation. It would make it possible for Statutory Native Civilians to try European British subjects when they have attained the powers of a First-class Magistrate, and it would give the same authority to Native Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces. (I omit all mention of Cantonment Magistrates, because there is no probability of a Native Cantonment Magistrate ever being appointed except as a coadjutor to a European Cantonment Magistrate; in which case the latter, and not the former, would receive the powers of a Justice of the Peace.) The Bill further disqualifies European non-officials and Uncovenanted European officials from receiving these powers. Mr. Elliott could not support any of these modifications. In the case of the Statutory Native Civilian he does not think that the test of having received the powers of a First-class Magistrate is sufficient: these powers are ordinarily given after a comparatively short term of service, and an officer's worth hardly begins to be known till it is seen how he exercises them: a much longer and severer test should be applied before powers are given, the misuse of which would cause so serious a scandal and would discredit the class to which such an officer belongs: and Mr. Elliott would certainly postpone their conferment till the Local Government, by appointing the Civilian to the post of District Magistrate or Judge, had asserted its complete confidence in his capacity, honesty, and discretion. Again, with regard to Native Assistant Commissioners, there are none in Assam; but from his acquaintance with some of those in Berar and Mysore, the Chief Commissioner has come to the conclusion that the same rule should apply to them as to the Statutory Civilians, and that they should not receive powers to try European British subjects unless the Government has a sufficiently high opinion of them to appoint them Deputy Commissioners of districts. Lastly, with regard to the disqualification of European Extra Assistants and Deputy Magistrates, Mr. Elliott would regret to see such a change. There are five such officers in this Province who have powers of a Justice of the Peace, and they have exercised the powers with credit and discretion. It would be an administrative inconvenience if, for the sake of a scientific classification, such officers were debarred in future from exercising these powers.

6. If, therefore, in May 1882 the Chief Commissioner had had this Bill before him, he would have been obliged to dissent from the details to which exception has been taken; he would have recommended the omission from the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the passage about removing at once and completely every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race-distinctions; but he would have advised that, if the power of trying European British subjects were confined to Natives being—

- (a) Covenanted Civilians invested with the powers of a First-class Magistrate,
- (b) Statutory Civilians appointed to be District Magistrates or Judges, the Bill so amended should pass into law. Many things have happened since May 1882, and in the face of those events it does not necessarily follow that the same advice should be given now which would have been given then.

7. It will be in the recollection of the Government of India that the Chief Commissioner, in May 1882, drew attention to the race antagonism and to the prejudice which is still felt by non-official Europeans against Native Magistrates, but expressed his belief that the prejudice was dying out and that the measure then under discussion would not excite any great opposition. He admits now that he was mistaken in this prognostication, and that the feelings of mutual distrust appear to be as active as ever. Whether the storm of hostility with which the Bill has been met is entirely due to the Bill itself, or whether any such hostility would have been awakened had the Bill been confined to the provisions previously circulated to Local Governments, is open to question. But whatever may have been the origin of the excitement, there can be little doubt that the opposition now embraces all and every provision of the Bill, and that no compromise, such as a return to the proposals originally circulated, would satisfy the European public or lead them to look on the Bill with favour.

8. The question which the Government of India have to decide is, how much weight should be attributed to this opposition, and how far they would be justified in compelling one section of the community to submit to an enactment which they vehemently dislike, for the sake of improving the administration or raising the status of another section. And, in deciding this question, they must take into consideration not only the arguments for and against the Bill, but also the weight and volume of the opposition and its possible effects on the course of Government.

9. As to the arguments against the Bill, Mr. Elliott holds that they are for the most part based on an inaccurate appreciation of the facts, and are tinged by prejudice rather than by reason. He repudiates altogether the assertion that natives of the class who would be selected for such office are unfit, by reason of the difference of race, to understand the motives or arguments of an accused person of European birth, or that there is the slightest reasonable probability of their misusing their power through malice. The whole history of the working of the Civil Courts in Assam seems to him a refutation of such arguments. These Courts have largely to deal with the interests and quarrels of European tea-planters and landowners; they are resorted to with no apparent disinclination; the results of appeals from their decisions show that the Native Judges of these Courts exercise their functions, and hold the balance between European and Native, with discretion and justice. No doubt a Civil Court has not the same powers over the person as a Criminal Court: it cannot order immediate arrest: the consequences of a miscarriage of justice in it are not so serious to the individual as they would be in a Criminal Court. But still the powers of a Civil Court are considerable: it can mulct a man of his property; it can brand him as untruthful or dishonest; it can commit him for contempt of court or imprison him for insolvency. If, then, there are no complaints about the conduct of these Civil Courts, but the comparatively inferior Native officials who preside over them are admittedly efficient and independent, it is not reasonable to suppose that the few men who might be selected from these on account of their special ability and high character would, when sitting in a Criminal Court, misconduct themselves in cases where Europeans are concerned. It seems to the Chief Commissioner that the matters which come up for decision in a Civil Court, such as questions of trading custom, of bonds, of loans, and of contracts are, as a rule, more intricate, and require more knowledge of the habits and feelings of the litigant class, than the questions which are raised in a criminal trial; and therefore the whole series of objections which are based on the supposed inferior ability of Native Magistrates to try such cases seem to Mr. Elliott to be wholly mistaken. He does not accept as probable the idea that Criminal Courts would be flooded with false charges, when Civil Courts are not so flooded. Indeed, he has no hesitation in adopting the opinion expressed by Mr. Johnson that the decisions of an able and experienced Native Magistrate would probably be much more sound and accurate than those of a young English Civilian during the first few years of his service in the country.

10. But though the arguments against the Bill seem weak, there remains the weight and volume of the opposition to it, and that appears to Mr. Elliott a much more serious matter. There is probably no Province in India in which it is as serious as in Assam. There are perhaps more European settlers in Bengal (outside of Calcutta) than in Assam, but they bear a smaller proportion to the mass of the population, and their interests, important as they are, are rivalled or overshadowed by other interests. In Assam they form a larger number, relatively to the population, than in any other part of India, and their interest in the country is more influential and important than the interest of any other class. They are the one intelligent, energetic, improving class in the Province; they are the natural allies and assistants of the District Officers; and any event which should set them in determined opposition to the Government would be in a high degree disastrous. The Deputy Commissioner, who should be on bad terms with his tea-planters, would probably deserve to be condemned for want of tact and managing power, and would find himself hampered at every turn, in Court and out of Court. Already since this Bill was introduced, the Chief Commissioner has painfully felt the estrangement it has produced, and the delay it has caused in carrying out useful reforms and improvements which were in progress. He thinks, therefore, that it would require a very strong case to justify any enactment which should exacerbate and perpetuate the alienation which at present exists.

11. No such case can, in his opinion, be made out for the Bill under discussion. The argument from administrative inconvenience is allowed to be a weak one: it does not exist in Assam at all, and nowhere can it become serious for several years. The Chief Commissioner's view is that the Bill, if modified as he has suggested, is a good one, and one which it was right to introduce; but that it is not one of much practical importance, and events have shown that it had better be withdrawn. The step was a step in advance, but not a great one; and it is not worth while to take it, when we see the injurious effects which it has produced, and is likely to go on producing, in other unexpected directions.

12. This recommendation to abandon the Bill is not made without regret; for the necessity of making any concession to overpowering hostility—any retreat in a course of policy which has hitherto been a continuous and successful advance—is a regrettable incident. But the Chief Commissioner feels that much larger issues are at stake than the success or failure of this particular Bill. The most painful part, to him, in all this bitter ebullition of feeling, has been the conviction that it has not been evoked by the Bill alone, but is the expression of a determined hostility on the part of non-official Europeans to the general scheme of raising the natives of India to a political equality with ourselves, and to a fair share in the Government of the country. He fears that it is the principle of local self-government that is being struck at under the guise of the "Ilbert Bill;" and if that is so, it is a cause for poignant regret that any provisions in the Bill should have been so drawn as to awaken opposition to the principle on which the morality of our tenure of the Government of India is based. Mr. Elliott believes he is in harmony with the feelings of most of his District Officers when he declares that, in recommending the abandonment of this Bill, he does not mean that the Government of India should in the smallest degree retreat from the general lines of policy on which the Bill was based. No one can hold more emphatically than he that our raison d'être in India rests on the gradual elevation of the natives of the country to share its government with us, and to take a larger and still larger share in that government as time goes on. He has no sympathy with the argument about the conquering and the conquered race: no permanent Government can possibly rest on such a basis; if the conquest of India was guided by Providence for the good of the country, it can only have been in order that we might introduce a system of government which shall by degrees obliterate the memories of the conquest. The only postulate is that reforms should be gradual and tentative, and that nothing should be done which, on a general survey of the whole, seems likely to produce more harm than good. It is Mr. Elliott's opinion that the measure under discussion will on the whole produce more harm than good, and he advises its withdrawal. He has seen, during his service in India, many measures of reform taken, and a general advance all along the line; in every case these measures have been successful, and the worst thing that could be said of them is that they might have been stronger or have been taken earlier. It need be no cause of shame to the Government of India, to admit that one step in advance has been proposed too soon, and should be receded from; nor need it be taken as an indication of any change in the general policy, or any relaxation of the desire to govern the country through and for the people of the country, as soon as it can be safely and conveniently done.

Circular No. 21, dated 5th April 1883.

From—W. C. MACPHERSON, Esq., C.S., Asst. Secy. to the Chief Commissioner of Assam,
To—The Judges, Assam Valley Districts and Sylhet, and all Deputy Commissioners, Assam.

I am desired to forward a copy of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, and to ask for an expression of your opinion on its provisions. As the Bill has been and is vehemently opposed by the influential body of non-official Europeans in the country, it is desirable that you should take especial care to state your views with precision, in order that the Government may thoroughly understand on what grounds you do or do not recommend that they should persevere with the Bill.

2. The following are the principal lines of thought which may be followed on this subject: you may hold that the Bill is a good Bill, and that the opposition to it is either so mistaken or so factitious that it will subside when sound reason resumes its sway; or you may hold that the Bill is bad in principle and should not be adopted, even if it were not unpopular; or you may hold that the Bill, though sound in principle, is not of much importance, and that it would be unwise to proceed with it in the face of the genuine hostility which it has elicited. And, besides these main lines of thought, you may think it necessary to criticise the details of the Bill, and the classes to which it is proposed to extend the powers of a Justice of the Peace.

3. These suggestions are made, not to influence the expression of your opinion, which should be as frank and independent as possible, but to indicate the chief points to which your reply should be directed. It is necessary that your answer should be received by the end of May, as the Chief Commissioner is directed to submit the provincial report by the end of June.

No. 829G., dated 26th May, 1883.

From—W. E. WARD, Esq., Commissioner, Assam Valley Districts,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to reply to your circular letter No. 21, dated the 5th April 1883, in which my opinion is called for upon the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. It is difficult to say anything on this subject which has not been said before by others whose opinions are entitled to more weight than any that I can give; but, as I am decidedly opposed to the Bill, I think I am bound to state fully the grounds upon which my opposition is based.

3. The effect of the proposed amendment, if carried, may be stated thus. By the law as it now stands, no Mufassal Magistrate or Judge, who is not himself a European British subject, can be appointed a Justice of the Peace; and no one but a Justice of the Peace can try a European British subject on a criminal charge. In other words, no one but a European British subject can try a European British subject on a criminal charge. The Bill proposes—(1) to give Local Governments the power, if they think fit, to appoint any Covenanted Civilian, Assistant Commissioner or Cantonment Magistrate, who has first class Magistrate's powers, to be a Justice of the Peace without any regard to their nationality; (2) to make all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ex officio Justices of the Peace, whether European British subjects or not, and without regard to their fitness to try European British subjects.

All Native Sessions Judges, therefore, and Native District Magistrates ex officio, as well as all Covenanted Civilians, Assistant Commissioners and Cantonment Magistrates, who have first class powers, and whom the Local Governments think fit to appoint Justices of the Peace, will have the following powers conferred upon them with respect to the trial of European British subjects, over whom hitherto they have exercised no jurisdiction whatever:—

- (a) If a Judge, the accused may be sentenced to one year's imprisonment or fine, or both.
- (b) If a District Magistrate or a Mufassal Magistrate of the first class, the accused can be sentenced to three months' imprisonment or Rs. 1,000 fine, or both.

4. It is scarcely necessary for me to refer to the strong European public feeling which has been excited all over India, and in this Province in particular, against this proposed change in the law; and, although I by no means adopt the view that, in India, Government measures should be made subservient to public feeling, I think it must be admitted that the European public have in the present instance some ground for alarm. I would recommend, therefore, that, in deference to the strong and not altogether unreasonable feeling that exists against the Bill, it should not be proceeded with, at any rate in its present shape, unless it can be shown that strong administrative grounds exist for doing so.

5. With reference to the question of administrative necessity as a ground for proceeding with the Bill, I do not think it can be said that any such necessity at present exists in any part of India. It certainly does not exist in this Province. Whatever inconveniences may arise 20 years hence may be considered when they do arise; but I do not think we need legislate now for possible inconveniences that may arise in the next generation.

The sole question to be considered now should be whether, having regard to public feeling on the subject, any such serious inconvenience exists at present, or is likely to arise in the next four or five years, from the present state of the law as would justify the Legislature in altering the law. I think it cannot be disputed that this question must be answered in the negative. In the first place, it will be a long time before any appreciable number of Natives will have risen to be District Magistrates or Sessions Judges; secondly, I do not anticipate any appreciable inconvenience even when the maximum proportion of one-sixth of the Civil Service is composed of Natives; for, long before that maximum is reached, it must be borne in mind that our communications throughout India will be considerably improved, and thus the inconveniences to parties and witnesses arising out of transfers of cases from one district to another will be considerably lessened. It is, moreover, very seldom that a Mufassal Judge is called upon to try a European (I have had only one such case in this division during the seven years I have been here); and, with regard to District Magistrates, it can always be arranged that, where the District Magistrate is a Native, the Joint Magistrate or Senior Assistant Commissioner at the head-quarters of the district shall be a European British subject and a Justice of the Peace with first class powers. In cases, therefore, against European British subjects with which a Magistrate is competent to deal, there is no reason to anticipate that any inconvenience whatever to witnesses and parties will ever arise by maintaining the law as it now stands. Thus, the inconveniences, which I understand it is one of the objects of the Bill to remove, seem to me to be inappreciable, and do not, I think, afford sufficient ground for proceeding with the Bill in face of the very strong public feeling which has been excited against it.

6. In speaking of public feeling, I refer, of course, solely to European public feeling. Native feeling I leave altogether out of consideration, because I do not think that in a matter of this kind it has any claim upon our consideration. The mass of the people certainly have no feeling whatever on the subject, one way or the other; and with regard to the upper non-official class of Natives, I do not think there is any ground for supposing that they ever wanted a change in the law until the present Bill was published. Even now they do not pretend that the Bill will do them any good. Many respectable Natives are against the proposed change; others only support it, because they think it affords another manifestation of the present benevolent policy of Government in granting them extended powers of local self-government. These latter have also taken up the view (which I think has rather been suggested to them by the discussions that have taken place on the Bill than by any original feelings entertained by themselves on the subject) that the privilege which the European now enjoys of being tried by his own peers is invidious and casts a stigma on the character and qualifications of Native Magistrates.

7. This brings me to the feelings of the Native official class upon the subject. As regards these, I must say that, if, before the Bill was published, they ever felt (which I very much doubt) the invidiousness of the distinction which prevents their trying Europeans, I cannot understand the feeling. I can conceive nothing more natural than that a European should prefer to be tried by one of his own race. Rightly or wrongly, he distrusts the Native Magistrate, whether we call the latter a Covenanted Civilian or by any other name. He has had practically no experience of the Covenanted Native Civilian, still less of the Statutory Civilian (a Native Cantonment Magistrate has, I understand, never been seen); and, as regards the Native Assistant Commissioners, it cannot, I think, be said that they are entitled as a class to any special confidence on the part of the European public, although no one will deny that there are many able officers to be found belonging to that class. Seeing, then, what European public feeling is in the matter, I cannot understand the desire of any Native Magistrate or Judge which prompts him to move the Government to disregard and crush that feeling. I cannot conceive any Native of education and right feeling, or possessed of any pride in his constitution, claiming the right to try a man who, with or without reason, does not expect justice from him? Indeed, I refuse to believe for a moment that any such Native feels in the least degree slighted at the thought that he can only try a man of his own race. It would be as reasonable to suppose that I feel slighted because the Criminal Procedure Code gives a Judge of my experience, with power to sentence a Native to death subject to confirmation by the High Court, and to transportation without such confirmation, power only to sentence a European British subject to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine. No doubt, there may be a few Native Magistrates whose vanity prompts them to think they should be empowered to try Europeans. The feeling, however, is a bad one; and it is not towards gratifying the vanity of the few that legislation should be directed.

Then, again, I have not yet found any answer to the argument that, in the matter now under discussion, it is not the feelings of the Judge that we should consult but those of the people whom it is proposed to place under his jurisdiction. I see that one Hon'ble Member in the Council of His Excellency the Governor General, replying to this argument, said that he saw no reason why that which did not hurt the feelings of Europeans in Presidency towns should hurt them in the Mufassal; but I would submit that, whether we appreciate or not the reasons on which public feeling is based, we must, when legislating for the good of the people, recognize the fact that the feeling does exist.

8. I do not lose sight of the fact that, except in the case of Judges and District Magistrates whom the Bill declares to be ex officio fit to try Europeans, it is not proposed to give jurisdiction over Europeans to any but selected Native Magistrates. The Bill, however, gives unlimited discretion to Local Governments to select; and I do not think that public confidence in a Magistrate is likely to be enhanced by the fact that a Local Government has selected him; and any Bill which renders it possible for a European to be subjected to the criminal jurisdiction of a Native in whom the European public have no confidence is, I think, wrong in principle, and will, I fear, if passed into law, be not only productive of much bad feeling between Europeans and Natives all over India, but will probably also lead to many scandalous scenes in Courts presided over by Native Magistrates. It must also be remembered that a Local Government is a very variable abstraction. It possesses no very fixed ideas as to the fitness of persons or things. The head of a Local Government to-day may think that its powers of selection under this Bill ought to be rarely exercised; his successor to-morrow will think that they ought to be rarely withheld. In short, the action of Local Governments under the special powers conferred upon them by the Bill will, I am afraid, vary very much according to the individual views of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner upon the general question now under discussion. The practical effect of the Bill, therefore, if passed, will simply be to shift the responsibility of deciding the general question from the shoulders of the Government of India to those of the Local Governments. This, I think, the European public are entitled to object to. The subject under discussion is of sufficient importance, I think, to require that the Imperial Legislature shall settle it one way or the other, and not leave it to less responsible shoulders. Moreover, the decision of the general question is one which should affect all European British subjects in India alike, and should not be left to be decided by Local Governments in such a way that the Europeans of one Province may find themselves deprived of privileges of which those in a neighbouring Province are in full enjoyment.

9. It is unnecessary to go into the question as to whether the European can claim the right to be tried by his own peers; it is sufficient to find that he has enjoyed the privilege of being so tried for many years and in many countries, and that he values that privilege highly. We, as rulers, cannot fail to appreciate this feeling, nor can we disregard it, even though we may think that it is based more on sentiment than on reason; for we know full well that many of our existing institutions continue to exist mainly by reason of the sentiment which attaches to them. This privilege, then, which the European values so highly, should not, I think, be taken away from him on any other ground than that of administrative necessity. When the matter is looked at in this light, it seems to me that the stigma theory has nothing to support it.

10. Upon the question as to whether Native Civilians and Assistant Commissioners can ever be trusted with the powers it is proposed to give them, I do not wish to give any decided opinion. I should be sorry to say that none are to be trusted, and, so long as there are any fit to exercise these powers, it can, of course, be said that Local Governments may very well be trusted to find out these men. I have myself never yet seen a Native Covenanted Civilian who has been to England, and I have only come across one Statutory Civilian, without seeing any of his work. I am scarcely, therefore, in a position to judge of the powers and qualifications of a Native Civilian. I would deprecate, however, any a priori theory that supposes that a Native who has been to England and competed for the Civil Service is, by reason of this fact alone, competent to try a European. Much more than this is required before any Native can enter into our feelings and motives, and appreciate or even understand our family and social relations. That he does not understand these things no Native would, I venture to think, attempt to deny; and I think the European may well ask, without being necessarily accused of stigmatizing the Native character or raising invidious distinctions, "Is any man fit to try me, whose entire habits of life, thoughts, feelings, opinions, are so entirely distinct from my own, and who may therefore frequently be led to pronounce a wrong judgment upon me by reason of his want of sympathy with me or a proper understanding of the real merits of the case against me?" Of course, if the validity of this argument is admitted with respect to the Covenanted Civilian proper, it applies with greater force to the Statutory Civilian and the Native Assistant Commissioner, who have never visited England at all.

11. No doubt, it may be said that the present Bill can do no harm if the number of cases in which a European will be tried by a Native will, as is anticipated, be so small; but I think legislative action should have something stronger to support it than the mere allegation that it is harmless. Moreover, I think the Bill, if carried into law, will do much harm; for, as already stated, it will, I have no doubt, produce an amount of bad feeling between Natives and Europeans, especially among the lower classes, which it will take many years to eradicate. Nor do I think the fact that the punishing powers of Judges and Magistrates over Europeans convicted by them of a criminal offence are small any ground for giving those powers. This, of course, is merely another form of the argument that the Bill may be supported on the ground that it can do little or no harm.

12. A good deal has been written and said to the effect that, if the Bill is carried, European capital and enterprise will be driven out of the country, or, at any rate, will receive a severe check. I do not believe this for a moment, for the simple reason that cases will, I am sure, whatever happens to this Bill, be exceedingly rare in which a Native will ever sit in judgment upon a European; and European enterprise and capital are not so easily frightened from a country where such large profits are to be found as in India.

13. In conclusion, I would only add that, had the Bill confined itself to carrying out what Mr. Gupta originally proposed, namely, that Covenanted Civilians (excluding the Statutory Civilian) who rose to the position of a District Judge or Chief Magistrate of a district (Deputy Commissioner, as he is here called) should have ex officio powers to try Europeans, I do not think any one would have seriously objected; and, were it not that the present Bill has excited so much bad feeling, I should have been inclined to propose that it be modified to meet Mr. Gupta's proposal, and nothing more; but, in view of the present state of public feeling, and seeing what little real necessity there is for such a modified Bill, I should prefer seeing the present Bill withdrawn altogether without anything being offered in substitution for it. As an alternative proposal, however, I would suggest that the privilege which the European now enjoys of being tried by his own peers be continued to him, but that he be allowed to waive the privilege and submit himself to the jurisdiction of any Native Magistrate of the first class, whether he be a Covenanted Civilian or Assistant Commissioner, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Honorary Magistrate, or Deputy or even Sub-Deputy Magistrate. I am quite certain that, if a Bill of this kind were passed, many Europeans would, for their own convenience, waive their privileges in many cases, and assert them only in cases of difficulty or importance. It would be well also if, at the same time, Europeans were, by an amendment of the Code, allowed to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of European Judges and Magistrates in cases which, under the present law, these latter cannot now try. It is a serious thing for a European planter in Assam, and also for witnesses here, to feel that in a certain class of cases they must all, whether the accused or complainant wishes it or not, be sent up for trial and examination to the High Court at Calcutta, because the Judge has no power to pass a sentence exceeding one year's imprisonment and fine.

14. I notice that the Bill excludes Extra Assistant Commissioners, the Deputy Magistrates of Bengal and Honorary Magistrates, and this, too, whether they be European or Native, from being selected by Local Governments as fit to try Europeans. I do not understand why they should be excluded. If it be held that there must be some Assistant Commissioners with first class magisterial powers who are fit for selection to try Europeans, the same, I think, may certainly be said of any class of Magistrates who have first class powers.

15. I enclose the opinion of the only district officer who, up to date, has reported on the Bill. The Deputy Commissioner of Darrang has, I understand, reported to you direct.

No. 172 A., dated 4th May, 1883.

From—H. MUSPRATT, Esq., Judge of Silhet,

To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Circular No. 21 of 5th ultimo, giving cover to a copy of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. I beg to tender my sincere thanks to the Chief Commissioner for permitting me to express my opinions on the said Bill frankly and independently.

3. (1) I think the Bill should never have been drawn up in its present form, as it is very circumscribed in its application, and is totally opposed to the views given in the second ground of Objects and Reasons.

4. (2) I think the Bill was a mistake, as it is proposed to remove an anomaly and to confer new powers on some ten Government officials, without any consideration being given to the feelings of the thousands who will be affected by the amended law.

5. (3) I hold that the Bill has been introduced at a most inopportune time. The minds of the people are in a very unsettled state in consequence of the introduction of local self-government throughout India, by the proposed law of landlord and tenant in Bengal, and by the proposed Land Regulation in Assam.

6. (4) The proper time has not arrived for introducing a Bill to do away with race-distinctions. Very startling changes are proposed before the masses of the Native population are sufficiently advanced to understand that the object of the Bill was to raise the status of the Native Civilians, and not to lower the status of all European officials, whether covenanted or uncovenanted.

7. With reference to my first ground of objection, I notice that the Bill proposes to give jurisdiction over European British subjects to—(a) members of the Covenanted Civil Service, (b) members of the Native Civil Service, (c) Assistant Commissioners, and (d) Cantonment magistrates. The Bill thus excludes all the Subordinate Magistrates, whether European British subjects or Asiatics, as though they were not only inferior in position, but also in judicial acumen.

8. It would, I consider, be most unjust to debar European Subordinate Magistrates altogether from holding jurisdiction over European British subjects. Numbers of those officers have for many years held such powers, and no one has ever charged them with acting unjustly when their fellow-countrymen have been tried in their Courts.

9. It may not be intended to deprive those already entrusted with the powers of Justices of the Peace; but why, I would ask, should not those that come after them (if fitted) be invested with similar powers? They must surely be quite as experienced, able, and trustworthy as the members of classes (b), (c), and (d).

10. If it is the desire of the Government of India to remove from the Code at once, and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based on race-distinctions, why should a new anomaly be created, and the powers already held by a large number of officers be taken away, in order to give more powers to a very small number not holding similar powers outside the Presidency towns?

11. It appears to me that the proposed change in the law would, in a very short time, create many instances of administrative inconvenience, and injured parties would have to travel to the sadr stations to prosecute petty charges that might, as hitherto, be tried by fully qualified European Deputy Magistrates at the sub-divisions.

12. I propose, in the next place, to consider why (2) the Bill was a mistake.

13. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons it is stated—"It was thought anomalous that Natives of India should be deemed incompetent to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the Presidency towns."

14. It appears to me that the greatest anomaly was in the granting of such powers to Natives of India in the Presidency-towns. I do not remember to have heard that the appointment of non-Europeans in Calcutta was ever considered a success. No Member of the Council in the debate on the proposed Bill named any one of them as a proof that the powers granted to Natives in Calcutta should be extended to the Mofussil.

15. The Government of India calls the proposed change the removal of every judicial disqualification based merely on race-distinctions, and asserts that it is an anomaly that Natives of India competent to discharge the highest judicial duties should be incompetent to be Justices of the Peace. Why, then, would the Government give the powers to Natives holding certain posts, and debar others of the same race who have long sat in the Courts as Magistrates, and have earned the confidence of the Governors of Provinces by their integrity and upright conduct?

16. When the English obtained possession of each portion of the Indian Empire, the Courts of the country were found to be so venal and corrupt that it was found imperatively necessary to legislate that European British subjects should only be tried by their fellow countrymen. They have continued to try them. Why, then, should that power now be withheld from them unless they are members of classes (a), (c), and (d)?

17. I consider that the distinction raised in the selection of officers to be empowered to try Europeans is a great mistake.

18. Mr. Elliott states in the circular that the proposed Bill has been, and is, vehemently opposed by the influential body of non-official Europeans in the country.

19. I maintain that they have just grounds for their opposition to the Bill, and their assertions clearly prove that the time is not yet arrived for the proposed change.

20. European British subjects are convinced that they should not be tried by Natives of India, who do not understand their manners, customs, and feelings; who do not entertain any respect for their own women; and who would prefer to have their women steeped in ignorance.

21. It cannot possibly cast any slur on those Native gentlemen who have won high positions in the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Services that they should not be asked or compelled to try charges brought against European British subjects. I have been a member of the Bengal Civil Service for 33 years, and I never heard such an assertion made before I read the speech of the Hon'ble Durga Churn Lahā.

22. I can point out a stranger anomaly than the one that has led to the introduction of the present Bill, but I do not consider that it imposes any disparagement or casts any slur on me as a judicial officer. The present Deputy Commissioner of Cachar is under 11 years' service, and had not even arrived in the country when I was appointed Sessions Judge at Cachar; yet he is empowered, under section 30, Criminal Procedure Code, to sit alone to try any offence not punishable with death, while I have to try similar cases with the assistance of assessors.

23. Europeans are truly afraid of being tried in the Courts of Natives, whose fellow countrymen daily prove that their chief weapon of offence against a rival or an enemy is to bring against him a false charge backed up by perjured witnesses. Both Hindus and Muhammadans institute false charges, and it is not confined to the poor and ignorant of those two races.

24. In Assam, 2,336 false cases were detected in 1880, and 2,105 in 1881, or nearly ten per cent. of the cases instituted in each year, and over 25 per cent. of the charges brought were rejected. Of persons brought to trial, the numbers acquitted in 1880 and 1881 were respectively 4,862 and 4,956.

25. How, I would ask, can the Government expect that any European (man or woman) would consent to be tried by a Court when the prosecutor, witnesses, investigating officer, Magistrate, mukhtars, and vakils are all aliens to him or her in race, feelings, and religion, &c. ?

26. It is very unfortunate that the Government of India did not consult some of the officials who are daily hearing cases, and who could have understood both sides of the question, and would not have treated it as a matter solely of State policy and convenience.

27. This is the first time that the feelings of any class of officials have been consulted. It is a great mistake to pander to such sensitiveness. Government should rather have considered the feelings and antipathies of those who would be affected by the proposed Bill.

28. I cannot but feel that the determined opinion of Government, stated in their Objects and Reasons, has given rise to much of the strong language used in discussing the proposed changes in the law.

29. I next proceed to consider whether the Bill should have been introduced at the present time, and what effect it is likely to have on the Native races in Lower Bengal and Assam.

30. In 1882, the Government of India decided that local self-government should be started throughout the length and breadth of India.

31. It is unnecessary for me to specify what great changes were thus introduced, and how it has given importance to many things, many places, and many people. The majority of the people formerly took no interest in the matter of roads, education, &c.

32. Government are now desirous that the masses should think for themselves on the subject of self-government, and they have been called on to assist in the election of the members of the committees. The laws for carrying out self-government were only under discussion when this amendment of Criminal Procedure was notified.

33. The Code of Criminal Procedure was passed in March last year, and came into force on the 1st of January of the present year. The introduction in February of a radical change in selecting the officers to be appointed to try European British subjects by an amending Bill must arouse feelings in the Natives of India that the Code contained a very glaring error, which should not have occurred while the Code was before the Council of India. They would naturally enquire what changes were proposed; and what must they think of the announcement that Government had determined at once, and completely, to remove from the Code every judicial disqualification based merely on race-distinctions?

34. The only conclusion they could arrive at would be this. Government have held incorrect views, and have assigned a higher status to European Magistrates and Judges than they were entitled to hold, and that henceforth those officials were to be reduced to the same level as the Native Magistrates and Judges.

35. The Natives of India will learn that the proposed amendments disqualify all Uncovenanted European Magistrates, and place in their stead certain Native officials about whose fitness or abilities very few of them know anything.

36. What, then, can the masses think of the proposed changes and the hurry with which an amending Bill has been introduced before the Council?

37. This amending Bill, to my mind, strikes a heavy blow at the foundation of the structure of the Criminal Courts in India, and lowers all Magistrates and Judges in the eyes of the masses. No longer will they respect those officials. The administration of justice will be carried on under considerable difficulties (signs of these are already cropping up), and the hitherto smooth working of the Government officials in their intercourse with the masses of the people will be seriously affected.

38. The people do not feel respect for the Civil Courts. They pay heavily for the privilege of using them, and they consider that those Courts have been created for their convenience, to enable them to recover their rights, and in many cases to injure their enemies.

39. But the Criminal Courts have been revered, as they are backed up by enormous powers, namely, by the police and by the terrors of the jail and of transportation across the black waters. It is impossible at the present time to convince a villager that he will get the same justice before a fellow-countryman as before a "saheb;" and, until the mass of the people feel assured they will get equal justice before Asiatic and European Magistrates, the time has not arrived to introduce the proposed changes into the Code of Criminal Procedure.

40. In the present year, a Bill affecting landlords and tenants in Bengal has been discussed in the Council. It has given rise to very conflicting opinions, and the landlords are as deeply moved by that Bill as the Europeans by this amending Bill. Silhat is convulsed by the proposed Land Regulation for Assam.

41. Heretofore the Government of India have felt their way, and have introduced changes in the law singly and cautiously. But now no less than three laws making vital changes are being started at one time in Lower Bengal and also in Assam.

42. I maintain that the present was a most inopportune time for the introduction of a law that must bring to the surface race-antipathies that were slumbering, but which might have ceased to exist in process of time.

43. In conclusion, I would most respectfully urge that this amending Bill should be withdrawn, and I sincerely trust that the hostility which it has elicited may be calmed down, and friendly feelings between all classes and races be restored.

No. 1005, dated 28th April, 1883

From—H. L. JOHNSON, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Silhat,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I had not intended expressing an opinion on the subject of the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill, with reference to your Judicial Department Circular No. 21, dated the 5th April, 1883. I thought I might leave the discussion of the measure to my successor; and I felt that my opinion, to be of use, should have been submitted a year ago. But, having learned that the Chief Commissioner wishes me to leave my opinion behind me, I submit a note on the subject. I am inclined to think the Bill wrong in principle. But I am sure that the time has not yet arrived for such a measure.

Note by H. L. JOHNSON, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Silhat.

The advocates of the measure do not state what its principle is. They refer to some principle, but they do not give its shape. Mr. Gupta talks of an invidious race distinction; but race distinctions are not necessarily invidious. A man cannot help being a Bengali; and, if they were, you could not on that account abolish them, and therefore you must recognise them. Nobody has suggested (or had suggested till this proposal was brought forward) that Mr. Gupta is unfit to exercise the powers in question. Lord Ripon speaks of the Bill following necessarily from the admission of Natives to the Civil Service. But we admitted Natives to the Civil Service on the same principle that we opened it to competition, because we hate artificial privileges and monopolies. If we had suspected we were depriving the English race of any race-privilege by it, we would not have taken this step.

It cannot be that the advocates of the Bill disapprove of all recognition of status in our laws, (status is but another word for distinction of race). In this country, status still rules supreme, and our efforts to supersede it by contact have not been very successful. To this day we recognise the status of Mainpuris even in our jails.

I sympathise with those who say that we came here by an unfortunate accident; that it is doubtful if we do any good and that we should go as soon as we can. I think we should frame all our measures with a view to going. I therefore disapprove of the admission to high posts by competition (which appears to be a part of the principle of the Bill), because that system brings Bengalis to the front; and I am doubtful if they are the race who are destined to succeed us in the government of this great Indian Empire.

Then it is not suggested that we can settle down and amalgamate with the peoples of India—become a force leavening the whole mass, as we have done in Ireland. If we could do this, then our special status as a superior race is an obstacle, and should be swept away as wrong in principle. If we cannot do this, then we can only remain here as a superior and conquering race. It is on this fact that I hold that, opportunity offering, we should go.

It is hardly possible to discuss the principle of a measure the advocates of which are apparently not clear about it themselves—veil it in such phrases as “the more liberal view.” But the opponents of the Bill have a clear and recognised principle of very respectable and ancient lineage; indeed, of scriptural authority. Ciris Romanus sum has been in all ages a cry to conjure with, and in time and place is no doubt a highly admirable principle. Since the struggle for life and survival of the fittest theory came to be applied to politics, the part which race-distinction plays in the world is better appreciated scientifically, but before the days of science race was revered instinctively. When the Englishman says “I will not be tried by a Bengali,” he has history, science, even the Apostle Paul, on his side. And, in the case before us, his assertion of his race superiority is specially justified by the fact that the Bengali belongs to a race he has conquered. His assertion of his race in the face of Egyptians, Chinese, Japanese, &c., looks like mere pride, but in the case of the races of India it is much more.

He has a feeling that a conquered race must necessarily dislike the conquering race. His experience of the Irish, whom he has admitted to equal laws, even to representation in his Supreme Council confirms the feeling. His experience in India, where he sees Natives carefully excluded from place and influence in the army, and even in the police, confirms the feeling. But he should at the same time remember that he submits to be tried by Irishmen, who are overtly more disloyal than the Bengalis, and probably hate their conquerors more. I make another objection to the principle of the Bill. It recognises a distinction between the Covenanted Civil Servants and other persons. Now whatever objection there may be to the recognition by the law of a difference of status which actually exists is natural, is indeed the most prominent fact in Indian history, past and present. The recognition for the first time in the Codes of a wholly artificial distinction is simply, from a liberal point of view, detestable. This objection is so obvious that I am surprised that a Government calling itself liberal should have proposed such a measure. I believe I am right in saying that the unrepealed laws and regulations of all the Presidencies may be searched through, and no case will be found in which members of the Covenanted Service are invested with judicial powers as such members. A proposal to abolish the Civil Service would not surprise me; a proposal to endow it, for the first time in the history of our rule, with special magisterial powers is in the highest degree retrograde.

Supposing these objections to the principle of the Bill to have been disposed of, I have only to consider whether the present is a convenient time for divesting ourselves of our status as conquerors. I use a general phrase, because, if one condition of that status is admitted to be anomalous, other conditions are so too. Thus, if we submit to be tried by Natives of the country, we cannot refuse to allow Natives of the country to form volunteer corps; we can no longer reserve certain of the superior grades of officers in the army to the conquering race, and so on. Much has been made of the argument that Europeans have already submitted to be tried by Natives; that Judges of High Courts and Presidency Magistrates may try Europeans. One writer, an ex-Lieutenant-Governor and Member of Parliament, says, "How very small the change of practice is. As Judges of the High Court, Natives have unlimited criminal jurisdiction; every day Native Magistrates try Europeans in the Presidency towns." But I am informed that the Judges of the High Courts do not, as a matter of fact, hold criminal sessions; that in the last 100 years there has never been a Native Magistrate in the European quarter of Calcutta, and only in six or seven years in the Native quarter. I am informed that at Bombay the Native Magistrates are Parsis, to whom, I presume, the objection that they belong to a conquered race or races does not apply. The strength of this argument depends on the extent to which Europeans have submitted to be tried by Natives. And the answer to it is obvious. The anomaly between town and country law may be most simply removed by withdrawing from High Court Judges and Presidency Magistrates the obnoxious powers. This argument that he has submitted himself is peculiarly offensive to the Englishman. He had allowed a Native to be appointed a Magistrate of the Northern Division of Calcutta, and other Natives to be appointed High Court Judges, in the belief that these measures did not practically injure his status. European cases are few in the Northern Division, and he thought the Native Judge would not be deputed to hold criminal sessions. He had no intention whatever of surrendering his status. When, therefore, his, as he thinks, unfortunate carelessness or good nature in these two cases is quoted as a reason for going further, he feels that he has been "jockeyed," as it were, out of his rights.

Then it has been said the present system is inconvenient. One instance is quoted from Dhaka. But no inconvenience actually occurred—some one admitted it might occur. I know Dhaka very well, and I state that the inconvenience mentioned is wholly imaginary. You may make the whole district staff Native, and you will find plenty of European gentlemen ready to do a petty Magistrate's duties for nothing. Another instance is quoted from Bombay, but here the inconvenience is stated to have occurred in connection with a railway which, I am told, has never been commenced. In some respects, I think, the change would prove inconvenient. The privilege of trial by his own race follows the Englishman into the Native States of India. Englishmen take service under Natives in Mysore, Haidarabad and other Native States, and, though there are occasional difficulties, the reversal of the natural relation is not so injurious as might be expected. The reason probably is, that the Englishman retains his privilege of trial by his own race. If he had not that privilege, the Native States would probably not obtain his services, or would have to pay a higher rate for them. So I think that unless Europeans retain this privilege, the appointment of Natives to districts where there are many European settlers (and they are daily increasing in number) will be practically impossible.

Against the Bill, in its practical application, arguments have been brought forward, not much better than those above-quoted in its favour. I am quite sure that the average experienced Deputy Magistrate would be as good a Judge in the case of a European accused as he is in the case of a Native. I am not sure about a young man just out from England. I think I would allow him time to sow his wild oats before giving him much authority. But, speaking generally, Natives make as good, or better, Magistrates than Europeans.

The only argument against the Bill to which I attach any importance is that it stigmatises a very worthy and highly useful body of men—Native Magistrates, not members of the Covenanted Civil Service—as unfit to exercise certain powers. The blot can easily be remedied by giving powers indiscriminately, and dropping the wholly illiberal distinction between Covenanted and Uncovenanted Magistrates.

It seems to me that the advocates of the Bill have failed most signally in making out a case, and that the opponents of the Bill have failed equally signally. It seems to me to be a question of sentiment on both sides.

The advocates of the Bill think it looks well for the conqueror to submit himself to the conquered; it is a magnanimous thing to do. The opponents, I believe, honestly think that a Native is an abominable creature, not at all fit to rule over them.

In the absence of any conclusive or strong argument, one way or the other, we should, I think, follow the liberal course of consulting the persons interested in the matter. They have given an almost unanimous vote against the measure: that they disapprove of it is, of course, itself a strong argument against it. It never does to legislate against, without, above or beyond the people for whose benefit you legislate, as we have so often proved in our administration of India.

When the word "Native" is no longer used by the Europeans; when the Native no longer describes his conquerors as the "sahib log;" when there is no longer a natural distinction between Natives and their foreign conquerors—then we may expunge all recognition of that distinction from the Statute-book. At present, the measure is premature. Indeed, I personally think that, as long as we remain here, the necessity for such a measure will not—indeed cannot—arise, but then I hope for a speedy departure. If the Government of India is determined to take a step in the direction indicated, I would suggest throwing all Cantonment

Magistracies open to Natives. There is much analogy between Cantonments and Presidency towns. The European element is so strong that they cannot indulge in the fears (as I think fantastic) for which his isolated position gives the European in the Mofussil some excuse. Then we have the precedent of the Presidency towns. Let us now extend the principle established in the Presidency towns to Cantonments, hill stations and other places where Europeans are most predominant.

No. 1381, dated 11th May, 1883.

From—H. L. JOHNSON, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Silhat,

To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

Under my letter No. 1005, dated 28th April 1883, I forwarded some observations on the proposed Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill. The proposal to make all non-official Europeans incapable of service as Justices of the Peace escaped my notice. As the Chief Commissioner is aware, I would, if possible, get all petty magisterial work done for nothing. There seems no good reason for imposing this special disability on European British subjects. It is anomalous that a man who holds and exercises such powers in England should be disabled by changing his domicile to India.

No. 840 J., dated 31st May, 1883.

From—J. K. WRIGHT, Esq., Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Cachar,

To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

In reply to your Circular No. 21, dated 5th April 1883, calling for an expression of opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, I have the honour to submit the following report.

In my humble opinion, the provisions of the Bill as they stand are altogether bad. The result of section 1 would be to disqualify the future European British Magistrates, even of proved competence and fitness, from being appointed Justices of the Peace, unless such Magistrates were either Cantonment Magistrates, Covenanted Civil Servants or Assistant Commissioners in the Non-Regulation Provinces. Now, there are scores of Magistrates, not belonging to any of these classes, who have been appointed Justices of the Peace, and who have fulfilled the duties of their office with credit. Why should such be debarred in future from being made Justices of the Peace? The Punjab Government has recorded its opinion that "the powers and jurisdiction to be exercised by judicial officers should depend entirely upon personal fitness." Again, the North-Western Provinces Government desire to appoint Native members who have proved their fitness. If, then, Europeans not belonging to any of the four classes above mentioned be personally fit, why should they not be appointed Justices of the Peace?

The second objection I bring against section 1 is that it enables Local Governments to appoint certain Natives as Justices of the Peace, and these, if first class Magistrates, will have the power to try Europeans.

I would consider this objection under different heads.

I fully admit that it would be a graceful concession to allow Natives belonging to the Covenanted Civil Service to become Justices of the Peace and to try Europeans. I use the word "concession" advisedly. To talk of their "claim" to such power is to misuse words. Claims they can have none. When they entered the service, they did so being well aware of the fact that, under the law, they could not try Europeans. Moreover, it appears to me to be ridiculous for a subject race to talk of their "claim" to try members of the conquering race. To talk of "justice" in demanding the concession is, in my view, equally ridiculous. "Justice" is obtained by the due and impartial administration of the existing laws of the land. What would be considered "justice" in one country is not considered so in another country, simply because the standard whereby to test the "justice" of any act differs in the two countries. If it is meant that the present laws are not justly and impartially administered by Europeans, then a case of injustice arises, and it becomes essential that other persons should be appointed who will administer the laws without partiality. But, before such a statement can be accepted, it is necessary to adduce proof, and up to date such proof has not been adduced. I am unable to believe that the Government is of opinion that the law is not justly administered by Europeans. Still less can I believe that the view of the Government is that the law will be administered with more impartiality by Natives than by Europeans. Hence all talk of "claim" and "justice" on the subject is, in my opinion, unwarrantable.

I say it would, under ordinary circumstances, be a graceful concession to extend the jurisdiction of Covenanted Native Civil Servants over Europeans; but, in the face of the violent opposition raised against such concession, I think it would be politically expedient to conclude that the time for making it had not yet arrived. Had the experiment been confined to this much only, I doubt whether any storm of opposition would have arisen. Had it arisen, I think the Government should have withdrawn the Bill, however much it lamented the prejudices of its European subjects. I draw a distinction between Covenanted Native Civil Servants and other Natives, because, in the case of the former, they have lived in Europe; they have mixed with Europeans; they have learnt the peculiarities and idiosyncrasies of English people (at least to some extent); they have necessarily become acquainted in a way with their methods of action and habits of thought; they are partially competent to draw deductions from their behaviour; and they are not so apt to draw false conclusions from actions not understood. There is in every way a wide difference between them and those Natives—"saturated with caste and religious prejudices, ignorant of European modes of thought and feeling." Of course, I assume that Government has no intention of appointing outcasted Hindus exclusively in the Civil Service. On the contrary, those who will be appointed under the Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3, will belong to the highest families, and so, no doubt, will be Native Assistant Commissioners in the Non-Regulation Provinces. Such gentlemen will be strict Hindus, and will be bound by their religious code. Now, are such persons competent to try Europeans, or to understand their actions? I do not believe in the use of abstract assertions, and so I will briefly give a few concrete instances. Take a charge of adultery. In this country a chaste woman is she who is supposed never to behold the face of any man but her husband and relatives. She dare not go out. To speak to, or be seen with, a stranger would involve the most fearful penalties. I have too often heard Native opinion—I mean the opinions of the educated Natives—on this subject. They are absolutely incapable of believing that the freedom of women is compatible with chastity. They attribute the grossest irregularities to all ladies, Native or European, who mix frequently and openly with the other sex. The published accounts of two Bengalis who visited England (and they may be assumed to be educated) prove conclusively what the judgment of Natives is about them. The most innocent action would be misconstrued by an orthodox Hindu, who would discover vice where the most perfect innocence existed. Any case in which there arises a question connected, however remotely, with the relations between the two sexes would be completely beyond the power and ability of an orthodox Hindu to comprehend. Thus, all questions of offences against marriage could not be tried by Natives.

Again, take the case of assault under provocation. Can a Native born and bred in the zanána, who has not mixed with Europeans, understand what is, and what is not, provocation? I have heard in open Court the most respectable persons tell each other "they lie." In Native society "you lie" is freely interchanged. At pancháyats I have heard it myself. The most foul abuse is occasionally interchanged by persons who ought to know better, yet there is apparently no resentment. There certainly is never an interchange of blows, nor the thought of any. Can a Hindu realise the grave provocation which the word "lie" raises to a European? Would he hold such a remark as any justification for a blow?

Again, take the case of mischief. A cow is a sacred animal to the orthodox Hindus, and it is as grievous a sin (if not more so) to take the life of a cow as to take the life of one's parents. According to the religious books, each hair of a cow is the seat of a god. So he who kills a cow commits a similar offence to killing a god. Suppose a European to kill a cow and to be tried by an orthodox Bráhman. Is the latter qualified to pass sentence? Will he not be influenced in his estimate of the accused's guilt by his own religious belief? Why, the Sástrás actually enjoin on all good Hindus the absolute necessity of committing perjury in order to save the life of a cow. Are men of this stamp competent to try Europeans? I say most certainly not. We know that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal himself challenges "most strongly the competence of Native Magistrates to try Europeans." I think, therefore, I may be excused for holding the same opinion, and for shewing on what grounds I challenge their competence. Those Hindus who have shewn their contempt for the monstrous absurdities above mentioned, who have so far shewn their superiority above caste-prejudices to cross the kulápani and receive an English education, should be treated on a different footing. The extension of the proposed jurisdiction to them might be defended, but certainly not to the others. What would be the result? A constant heart-burning. Suppose cases of the sort above described to be laid before a Native, and suppose the Magistrate of the district to be a European, would not an accused European apply at once for a transfer? The law permits the District Magistrate to transfer cases. Why should he not do so? If he did so, he would incur odium among the Natives, and would be reflecting on the Native Magistrate. If he did not do so, he would incur greater odium among his own people, and, moreover, would be acting probably against the dictates of his own judgment. Most certainly in any case where European ladies were concerned (as witnesses or otherwise), the Magistrate of the district would invariably transfer the case to his own file. This would be a wanton reflection on the Native Magistrate, and yet a necessity. The indignity of a European lady being taken before a Native Magistrate, surrounded by Native ámlá and Native police, would be simply an intolerable scandal. Why the wife of the commonest ámlá in the Court could only be produced in a palkí or behind a pardá. What respect would the Natives have for such a lady, or for her husband, the latter perhaps a high official? The mere knowledge that it was possible to drag a European lady before the Criminal Courts would be an incentive for any evilly-disposed person to bribe a servant to bring a false charge. I would strongly deprecate a law that rendered the occurrence of so grave a scandal possible. False charges are notoriously very common in India, and are very easily got up.

I would point out that it is incorrect to talk of the disqualifications of the Natives in connection with this question of jurisdiction. The right of Englishmen to be tried by men of their own race and colour is a personal privilege (if the term privilege may be used). It is a possession of no recent date: no reflection is cast upon the Natives at all. If the Natives were Dutch, it would be the same thing. It is absolutely incorrect to talk of the disquali-fiction of the Natives as the leading principle. It is nothing of the sort. An Englishman has a much cherished right of long standing. If this right (privilege be it) interfere with the exercise of certain powers by the Natives, it is an accident. But let the correct order of things be maintained. It is not the case that Natives were ever disqualified directly, and then certain privileges were given to Europeans. It is the accidental fact that the privilege has been enjoyed so long by Europeans that the Natives are indirectly disqualified.

Is it seriously meant that the Natives who practise polygamy, who treat their wives as caged birds, kept in the dark chiefly for the creation of sons, to perform the necessary shraddh or funeral ceremonies for the repose of souls, who immolate infants of tender age to marriage, who compel infant widows to remain widows till death—are such competent to try European men and women? Is no account to be taken of the wide gap which lies between the feelings of Europeans and of Natives, of the caste-prejudices of the latter, of the low estimate they have of women?

No; I maintain that the Natives are not competent to try Europeans, and therefore section 1 of the Bill is bad altogether in principle. Why should the Judge's feelings be taken into consideration? Surely the person to consult is the accused.

The present orders are that Native Civil Servants to be appointed under the Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3, shall be ordinarily appointed only to office in that Province where they were first appointed. Does not this recognise the fact that men ought to be tried by men of their own Province, who can best understand their actions? Is not this, too, the foundation of section 275, Criminal Procedure Code? This section enacts that "In a trial by jury before the Court of Session of a person not being a European or an American, a majority of the jury shall, if he so desire it, consist of persons neither European nor American." That is to say, the ruling race of the country are declared to be incompetent to form a majority of the jury to try a Native. Why? Because the Natives can understand a Native better. If, then, to try a Native the majority of a jury cannot consist of Europeans, why should a Native alone be allowed to try a European? It is a right he never possessed, and therefore it has not been taken away from him; and I know of no law of Nature or God which makes the right to try Europeans inherent in the Native. If the right is conferred, it is a concession, and a concession only. But this question was never raised by the Natives themselves; there was never any clamour for such a Bill; there was no movement of any kind made in favour of such a Bill until the present one was introduced. It was founded on the sentimental grievance of an individual. It is not desired by the mass of Natives.

If Government proposed to pay a monthly salary of Rs. 100 to every English-speaking Babu, no doubt there would be thousands in favour of such a Bill; or if Government proposed that any European convicted of assaulting a Native should be sent to jail without the option of a fine, no doubt thousands would welcome such a Bill. Where the Natives are to be benefited at the expense of the European by any particular Bill, it is not surprising that they should clamour for it.

When Government abolished sati and prohibited hook-swinging, and when it legalised widow remarriages, there was an outcry among the educated Natives; but what did this prove? Not that the mass of the people were with them, for they were not; so it is in this case. I maintain that the general public never wanted such a Bill. If a boon (so considered) is thrown at a man, it can hardly be expected that he will not accept it, even though he never dreamt of it. The law as it stands is the same for all. The privilege of administering it against a European is confined to Europeans. But I object to the Bill on other grounds. If the privileges of the ruling race be thus cast aside, what will happen to the numerous personal laws of the Hindus and Muhammadans? Will they not be threatened with abolition? Can Government confine itself to abolishing privileges of Europeans only? The turn of the Natives must come, and the present Bill will be used as a weapon against them. What opposition will they be able to offer when it is proposed to abolish their anomalies? And this brings me to the consideration of the grounds on which this Bill is brought forward. As far as I can make out, they are three—(1) to abolish an anomaly; (2) to abolish the invidiousness of the disqualifications (so-called) of Natives; (3) to remove administrative difficulties. These I would discuss one by one, taking them in inverse order.

The Provinces in which the largest number of Europeans live are undoubtedly Bengal and Assam. Yet what do these two Governments, which are the most intimately concerned with the Bill, say? His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal said in Council—"There is practically and really no administrative difficulty in connection with this matter." The Chief Commissioner of Assam appears to be of the same opinion, for he objected to any extensive conferment of jurisdiction over Europeans upon Native judicial officers at present. He advocated the claims only of Native Covenanted Civil Servants, and of Natives who may become District Magistrates or Sessions Judges. Now, as there is not a single Native in Assam belonging to either category, the conclusion is most obvious, namely, that in Assam there is no administrative difficulty which requires to be overcome. Moreover, the sole ground of the Chief Commissioner's advocacy was "the desire to make progress in the direction of equality between Native Covenanted Civil Servants and their British-born brothers." Every reasonable person will, I think, admit the necessity of this. It is inevitable in the march of progress that every year should see Europeans and Natives brought more and more on terms of absolute equality. But the Assam Government never advocated the Bill on the ground that it would remove administrative difficulties, for these do not exist.

In Burma, too, where there are many Europeans, there is no question of administrative difficulty. Thus, one of the chief grounds of the Bill is absolutely non-existent. Moreover, do the provisions of the Bill create "equality." No; they take away the privilege of becoming a Justice of the Peace from fit and competent Europeans in the Uncovenanted Service (unless they happen to be Cantonment Magistrates or Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces), and confer it on certain Natives. The double process, therefore, of levelling down and levelling up is performed at the same time, with the difference that the former is practised on the European, the latter on the Native. If my views be correct, there would seem to have been an error made by Mr. Quinton in Council when he said that Burma and Assam advocated the Bill on the ground of "administrative" convenience.

Next, as to the invidiousness of the disqualification of Natives. I have before pointed out that it is not a direct disqualification of Natives so much as a special privilege of Europeans. I would here take the liberty of commenting on certain views expressed in Council.

Mr. Quinton said:—"It is difficult to find any intelligible reason why an officer of sufficient judicial ability to be appointed a Presidency Magistrate should, when promoted or even transferred to a district beyond the Presidency, forfeit powers which he had been found to exercise in a satisfactory manner."

Again, the North-Western Government wrote:—"If a Native Civilian as Magistrate of the district may be trusted to exercise the powers of a Justice of the Peace, he should retain them when, his charge of a district being temporary, he reverts to a subordinate post." I would venture to point out that, in Non-Regulation Provinces, the Deputy Commissioner has very extensive powers; he can imprison up to seven years. If the same officer is transferred to a regulation district, he at once forfeits his powers: nor can the Government of India itself make him retain them.

Under section 30 of the Code, the North-Western Provinces and the Bengal regulation districts are excluded. Now, in Assam, Deputy Commissioners have for years been exercising the powers conferred under section 34. I am a Covenanted Civilian myself, and have exercised these powers. Nevertheless, when I am "promoted or transferred" to a Bengal regulation district, I shall at once forfeit my powers; nor will the Government itself be able to continue them on me. Is not this an exactly similar case? Have Europeans ever objected to this provision of the law? Does any one consider it a reflection on his fitness? Again, when a Joint Magistrate acts as Judge, he has certain powers. When he reverts to his jointship, does he retain them? It is not his fitness that ceases, but it is his cessation to hold a certain office; so it is with a Presidency Magistrate. Certain powers are attached to the office; any one holding the office enjoys them. On ceasing to hold it, he forfeits them, though his fitness remains the same. With all respect, therefore, to the high authorities quoted, I am unable to see what force there is in their argument.

Lastly, I would refer to the third objection, namely, that the privilege at present enjoyed by Europeans is an anomaly. The numerous personal laws and privileges of the Hindus and Muhammadans are surely greater anomalies. Is it not an anomaly that Native men should be exempted from personal appearance in a Civil Court, a privilege not enjoyed by the very highest European official or nobleman? Is it not an anomaly that, as mentioned by Sir Louis Jackson, a vakil who had practised 30 years in the Civil Courts should on his retirement be exempted from personal appearance in such Courts? Is it not an anomaly that Native women should be so exempt when not the highest English European lady in the land possesses that privilege? Is it not an anomaly that a Court should be debarred from seeing the demeanour of a witness, considering the express provisions of the law (section 363 of the Code), which enacts that the Judge or Magistrate shall record such remarks as he thinks material respecting the demeanour of a witness?

• Is it not an anomaly that the highest European cannot hold land in the same Province in which he is serving, whereas a Native is permitted to hold land in the same district in which he is serving, even though he may be Settlement Officer or Deputy Collector? Is it not an anomaly that infants should be permitted to marry? Is it not worse than an anomaly—nay, almost a crime—that a girl, if she is not under 10 years of age, may be sacrificed to marriage? Was not a child killed in this way in Silhat, and the husband was acquitted, because it could not be proved whether the child was just under 10 or not? Is not this barbarity sanctioned by section 375 of the Penal Code, while at the same time for persons not husbands it is criminal to let to hire, &c., a girl under 16 (vide sections 372-373, Indian Penal Code)?

Is it not an anomaly that favour should be shown to pure Natives at the Roorkee College to the prejudice of Eurasians, who should combine in themselves the united privileges of the Europeans and the Natives from whom they originally sprung?

Is it not an anomaly that the commonest Native, should he happen to be a sepoy, should enjoy the privilege of being tried by a first class Magistrate, whereas the highest and most respectable Native in the land is liable to be tried by a third class Magistrate?

But it would be an endless job to record all the anomalies existing; and, if common Natives, who are sepoys, are to be so tenderly treated and the best trial secured to them, is it unreasonable that Europeans should make the same claims and be privileged to get the best trial, namely, that by a person of their own race and colour and habits of thought and feeling?

But what object is to be gained by removing one anomaly and leaving numberless others? Europeans will still have special Courts; they will still be liable to diminished punishments by Courts other than High Courts; they will still be able to appeal from a fine of one anna, although a Native, punished on summary trial, will not be able to appeal from a sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment.

Next, as to section 2. There is no doubt a great deal to be said in favour of allowing Sessions Judges and District Magistrates who are Natives to try Europeans. I am myself of opinion that there would be no serious objection to this. But here again I would say that it would be a pure "concession," reasonable enough, no doubt; still I doubt whether the step is actually necessary at the present moment. We have the authority of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal for saying that, "in all his experience in India, the present is unmistakeably the strongest, most united and unanimous expression of popular discontent that he has ever witnessed." In the face of the deep and universal current of feeling disclosed by the agitation, I think it would be most inexpedient to grant even this concession just now, although I admit it is justifiable in more ways than one. What is the counterbalancing advantage contemplated? None. Will any reasonable person contend that the alteration in the law will, in the remotest conceivable degree, improve the moral, social or material prosperity of the Natives? We know on the highest authority that the moral, intellectual and political advance of the Natives depends upon the existence of harmonious relations between the two races. Is the success of the local self-government scheme to be imperilled by the creation of race-antagonism? Are the endless evils already caused, and those which may be caused in the future, counterbalanced by the removal of a sentimental grievance? Surely it must be evident to all what mischief has already been caused by the mere prospect of a change in the law.

I cannot conclude without making one point clear, as I do not desire to be misunderstood. What I wish to bring into prominent notice is that Natives are, from circumstances over which they have no control, incompetent and unfit to try Europeans in all cases (of course, in many cases there may be no difficulty of the sort). I do not for a moment insinuate that the Natives would wilfully pass improper judgments. They may be as just and as impartial as Europeans, but their unfitness is caused by their ignorance of European manners and customs. Natives may be as trustworthy and as honourable as Europeans, but it is no fault of theirs that they cannot understand Europeans. The fact, however, is undeniable, and this difficulty cannot be got over. And another point for consideration is this. The conferment of jurisdiction over Europeans on Natives will be a doubtful boon even for the latter. If a Native had to try a European of high standing, would he not be nervously anxious to acquit? The orders of Magistrates are upset by Judges, and those of Judges by High Courts, while those of the last are upset by the Privy Council. If a Native knew that his conviction of a European might possibly be upset on appeal, would he not be gravely apprehensive of being charged with a race-feeling, and of convicting on this account an innocent European? If the High Court or Judge were to upset such a conviction, would there not be a fearful outcry that an innocent European had been sacrificed to the animosity of the Natives? In the notorious Meres' case, would a Native, in the face of the conflicting testimony, have ventured to convict? In truth, whenever the conviction of a European by a Native was upset, on each occasion there would arise ill-feeling and animosity; and a few such cases occurring would be enough to produce grave political disturbances. It is the knowledge of these facts which would render a Native nervous, and so prevent him from convicting a European whom another European would not hesitate to punish. The European Judge would know that he was not exposed to evil insinuation; his action (if mistaken) would not at least be misconstrued. It is on these grounds also, I think, that the proposed jurisdiction of the Natives is objectionable.

In conclusion, I beg to apologise for any expression in this letter which may be deemed unbecoming or intemperate. The question at issue is one of the gravest and deepest political significance, and it may be that I have written in stronger terms than are necessary. But the instructions in your circular are that the "expression of my opinion should be as frank and as independent as possible." I have accordingly written without any reserve whatever.

No. 344, dated 21th April, 1883.

From—J. J. S. DRIBERG, Esq., Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Goalpara,
To—The Commissioner, Assam Valley Districts.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of Mr. Macpherson's circular No. 21 of the 5th April, 1883, Judicial Department, forwarding for an expression of opinion a copy of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. It is a difficult matter to say anything for or against the Bill without going over old ground, and reiterating what has been written over and over again in the various newspapers, both by its supporters and its opponents.

3. I have no objection to urge to the principle of the Bill. I think it is a good one, and is the natural consequence of Natives of India receiving a high class education and obtaining high offices under the States. Before long Native members of the Civil Service must in the ordinary course become Magistrates of districts; and, as such, they must be entrusted with powers to try all classes of cases and all classes of offenders. It would be invidious to hold that a Native District Magistrate should not try certain persons, but that his assistant should have that power, because he is a European British subject. I do not think that the former would be more liable to commit an error of judgment than the latter in ordinary cases that come before Magistrates. I know that all this has been said before, but, to my mind, it is the one and only argument in favour of the Bill. I allow it is a strong one too; but, in the face of the hostility it has elicited, I do not think the Government should proceed with the Bill. At any rate, if the Bill is to be read again, I think it should be limited to Native Civil Servants who are or may be District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, and should not be extended to Native Civil Servants generally or the other persons mentioned in paragraph 1. I suggest this in case it is proposed to press the Bill; but, as I have said, I would not advise this course on account of its unpopularity.

4. I enclose copy of report from Mr. Metcalfe, the Sub-divisional Officer of Goalpara.

No. 25, dated 13th April, 1883.

From—H. H. METCALFE, Esq., Sub-divisional Officer, Goalpara,
To—The Deputy Commissioner, Goalpara.

With reference to your memorandum No. 289 of the 9th instant, asking me for my opinion on the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill, I have the honour to say that I consider the Bill a good Bill in principle, but I do not think it ought to be adopted in face of the hostility it has excited between the European and the Native. Race-feeling is running high at present, and it might possibly affect a Native Magistrate's mind in his judicial dealing with Europeans.

No. 191 J., dated 22nd May, 1883.

From—A. C. CAMPBELL, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Kamrup,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Circular No. 21, dated 5th April 1883, Judicial Department, forwarding for an expression of opinion a copy of the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. The Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill fails to show any adequate reason for its introduction. After reciting that it was thought anomalous that Natives of India admitted to the Covenanted Service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace, the Statement proceeds to declare the intention of the Government of India to remove the present bar upon the investment of Native Magistrates in the interior with power over European British subjects, and abolish completely every disqualification which is based on race-distinctions. The Statement does not show that any administrative necessity has arisen calling for so wide a change in the law. There has been no failure or miscarriage of justice demanding a remedy, neither was the measure sought for by any section of the Native community. The proposal emanated from a single Native Civilian, and the disqualification which he proposed to do away with is one of which he was fully cognisant when he entered the service.

The importance of this disqualification has been greatly exaggerated, for, arising, as it does, from social reasons, it throws no slight whatever on the persons disqualified.

3. In declaring its intention to place European British subjects under the jurisdiction of Natives in the Mofussil, the Government of India appears to have overlooked the fact that it could only do so by depriving them of a right which they have long enjoyed; and I may venture to say that, if such a right had been enjoyed by Mahomedans or Hindus, so important a declaration of spoliation on the part of the State would have been likely to cause the greatest commotion throughout India among the members of the nationality affected. The Government of India do not appear to have anticipated the widespread opposition which the proposed measure would excite—an opposition which is all the more entitled to consideration, because it proceeds from the most law-abiding and intelligent section of the community. That opposition does not appear to me either mistaken or fictitious. The chief grounds alleged by the European community against the Bill appear to me reasonable and deserving of the most careful consideration of Government.

I would beg to call special attention to the fact that the opposition to the present Bill is not confined to the class principally affected by it, but extends to all those communities and nationalities, who were conspicuous by loyal support of our rule during the mutiny. Armenians, Greeks, domiciled Europeans of other nationalities, all seem keenly sensitive to the importance of the present measure as affecting the prestige of British supremacy in India.

4. Considering the mischief the proposal has already caused, and the great excitement which prevails while it remains nominally pending in Council, I should be prepared to recommend its formal withdrawal at an early date.

No. 49 G., dated 18th April, 1883.

From—H. C. WILLIAMS, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Darrang,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

With reference to your Circular No. 21 of the 5th April, asking for an opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, I have the honour to reply that

I consider the Bill to be bad in many respects, and to be also very unnecessary. In the first place, I fail certainly to see what changes have taken place since the Bill for the new Criminal Procedure Code was introduced in 1881. If the Government of India then thought it so necessary and so advisable to give to Native Magistrates the power to try Europeans, why was it not included then, and not deferred to this year? If it was not then necessary, whence has the necessity arisen now? Personally I fail to see the necessity, either then or now, of a Bill like the present, which will practically give Local Governments authority to invest any officer with power to try Europeans. It is quite true that there is an apparent anomaly in the fact that Mr. Gupta as Presidency Magistrate may try Europeans, while his compeer Mr. Dutt, though in charge of a district, may not; and I quite sympathise with the few gentlemen who, having passed the same examination as European Magistrates, find themselves not invested with the same magisterial powers, though in the matter of their civil funds they have acquired the same advantages as their European compeers. But, allowing this to be a hardship, there can be no possible reason why what may be possibly a sweeping change should be introduced, as is now proposed in the amendment. If the Government of India consider that the five or six Covenanted Civilians who have passed in England should be given power to try Europeans, a Bill might have been especially introduced for them, on the understanding that such powers should not be given to others hereafter in the same way. If I remember correctly, special rules have been made in the Bengal Civil Fund to prevent other Native Civilians acquiring all the possible advantages the earlier Civilians may do.

In this case there would have been some opposition, but it would have been recognised as a special case, and there would not have been the steady determined opposition to the Bill which there now is. Admitting, therefore, that, primâ facie, there are some grounds for giving the Native Covenanted Civilians the powers now proposed, there is no possible reason why the classes (b), (c) and (d) should be included in the Bill. At present, the possible persons are very few, one of those affected being an intimate friend of mine, and on whom I should have no objection to see the powers conferred; but there is always the danger that some future Government may pass an amendment that Assistant Commissioners are to include Extra Assistant Commissioners. And there is no doubt that, as far as the Province of Assam is concerned, it is this feeling which has led in fact to the opposition shown.

There are many Extra Assistants who, I am confident, would make good use of those powers; but there are most certainly a good many who would do the very reverse, while possibly acting quite within the law. In fact, I fail to see the slightest possible excuse for including classes (b), (c) and (d) in the Bill. To return to class (a), the next point to consider is whether to oblige a certain small number, it is fair to the European community to deprive them of a long-standing and almost world-existing privilege.

There is undoubtedly a great deal of sentiment in the opposition to the Bill; but is there also not a great deal of false sentiment, arising from the radical theories of the quality of all men, on the part of those who hold that these powers should be given? At the time these gentlemen went to England, they knew then there was no probability of the powers now asked for being bestowed upon them, and therefore the disabilities they now lie under are not new or not unexpected. I quite admit that there may be cases in which it will be found very inconvenient for Collectors and Sessions Judges not to have powers to try Europeans; but the time has hardly arrived, and the character of the present Bill, and the opposition which it has created, will make it now more difficult than ever to legislate when occasion requires; for there is no doubt that the opposition is not temporary or factious, but steady and determined. No body can doubt that a large majority of officials sympathise with their non-official Europeans in their protests against the Bill, and perhaps, had they been consulted, the Government of India would not have now found itself in the dilemma it now is.

I have heard the objection taken that, as Native Judges try civil cases in which Europeans are concerned with satisfaction to all concerned, there would be no harm in extending the same power in criminal cases; but those who bring forward these objections entirely forget that, in civil cases, arrest can always be avoided for a time at least, while in criminal cases it follows at once on the case being decided, or even in its being instituted: there is no possible analogy between the two.

As regards the Native population generally, it is quite certain they take no interest in the Bill. A respectable Native in nine cases out of ten prefers to be tried by a European to a Native Magistrate.

In conclusion, therefore, I respectfully beg to enter a protest against the Bill on the grounds that, as far as classes (b), (c) and (d) are concerned, it is quite unnecessary, while, with regard to class (a), the claims of the individual officers and the advantages to be derived from investing them with powers are outweighed by the disadvantages arising from the ignoring of what is esteemed by the majority of Englishmen a long-standing and valued right of trial by their fellow-countrymen. I forward the reply of the Sub-divisional Officer of Mangaldai in original.

No. 230, dated 13th April, 1883.

From—A. J. PRIMROSE, Esq., Assistant Commissioner, Mangaldai,
To—The Deputy Commissioner, Darrang.

With reference to your memorandum No. 27 I., forwarding copy of Circular No. 21 of 5th April, asking for criticism on the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, I have the honour to state that I consider the Bill as bad in principle and one which should not be adopted even if it were not unpopular. In all the discussion excited by the Bill I have not as yet discovered any reply to negative Sir Fitzjames Stephen's maxim, that, in deciding the Court for the trial of an accused, the feelings of the accused and not those of the Judge should be kept in view. As I feel certain that an Englishman would strongly object to his being put on trial before a Native Magistrate, I have no hesitation in condemning the Bill without reserve, as likely to cause infinite disgust to the persons who are affected by it, without any counterbalancing advantage either to Europeans or to Natives. In my opinion, the better class of Natives neither wished for the Bill to be introduced, nor care to see it passed through the Council.

Dated 4th June, 1883.

From—COLONEL T. LAMB, Deputy Commissioner, Nowgong,
To—The Commissioner, Assam Valley Districts.

With reference to the Chief Commissioner's Circular No. 21, dated 3rd ultimo, calling for a frank and independent opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction by Natives over European British subjects, which has been vehemently opposed by the influential body of non-official Europeans throughout the country. Since the introduction of the Bill, the Native Press has shown such a violent race-antagonism to exist amongst that class of Natives from whom the Covenanted Civil Service is likely to be largely recruited, that the impolicy of the measure is placed beyond doubt, and would, of itself, justify the withdrawal of the measure, the Council not being aware of such a deep-seated hostility at the time the Bill was laid before it. So long as false cases can be easily trumped up, and as easily supported by false evidence, Europeans living, as they do, isolated in the Mufassal would be menaced with serious danger at every turn. They could not condescend to the same unscrupulous methods by which such cases are conducted by Natives; it would be like putting a man with a walking-cane to defend himself against a well-armed and experienced swordsman. To expose our fellow-countrymen and women to trial by the class of Natives alluded to would be unjust in the extreme.

3. During my experience of some 30 years, I have found European British subjects to have such a scrupulous regard for the rights of the Natives, that it would be unjust to deprive them of the much-cherished right of trial by their own countrymen, more especially as no inconvenience has been experienced owing to Native Magistrates not exercising the power which the Bill proposes to confer on them. The few Europeans who may commit offences can be easily dealt with by European Magistrates, in whom the Natives themselves have full confidence.

4. With regard to the "Objects and Reasons" of the Bill, I do not think it follows necessarily that, because Natives have been found qualified to exercise the highest judicial functions among their own countrymen, they are also qualified to be vested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace, and to exercise such powers over European British subjects. It might as well be argued that, because a bucolic can drive a plough, he is also qualified to mount a drag and drive a team of thorough-breds.

No. 441E., dated 30th April, 1883.

From—COLONEL A. E. CAMPBELL, Deputy Commissioner, Sibsagar,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Circular No. 21, dated 5th instant, in which you ask for my opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. The introduction of the Bill was, in my opinion, an unwise measure; for, although it may be the wish of Parliament (I say Parliament, because the Bill is the outcome of the Government policy admitting Natives of India to the Civil Service) to remove from the Code every judicial disqualification based merely on race-distinctions, yet the hostility evinced towards it, and which has appeared in the public prints, shows conclusively that race antagonism is only dormant, and that it only requires a measure of this kind to open old wounds and produce friction between the races.

In this district, there have been two largely attended meetings of the planters, and the resolutions condemning the Bill passed at these meetings have been published in the Englishman.

I cannot but think that those who are in favour of the Bill look at it from a Presidency town point of view, and ignore, or are ignorant of, the life of a European British subject in the Mufassal.

Any one acquainted with Mufassal life knows how easily and how often false charges are got up, and a solitary European is sometimes at the mercy of false witnesses. Now, with all due respect for the Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, I would submit that their early training, their short residence in Europe and their mode of life in this country do not fit them to sit in judgment on an Anglo-Saxon in the Mufassal; and I do not think they could enter into or understand the feelings and motives of such a measure.

4. My remarks above refer only to Covenanted Native Civilians who have been to Europe, but they apply with still greater force to those members of the Native Civil Service who have not been to Europe, and who are included in the Bill.

5. There are European British subjects to be found in the Mufassal, both Irish, Scotch and English, whose speech would hardly be understood by the Native Civilian, who in the course of his life has never met with such but gauges all Englishmen by the standard of those he has met with in the course of his studies. I need hardly say that, if such British subjects were tried in the Mufassal by a Native Magistrate, although they did belong to the lower orders, yet their feelings ought to be understood and consulted, and this the presiding Magistrate could not do, and the result might be the judicial bench would be brought into contempt.

6. As far as my experience goes, all Englishmen are most jealous of their privilege to be judged by their peers; and in a country like this, where the Natives are of different races, and filled with every prejudice caste and religion can create, the introduction of the Bill is fraught with much future embarrassment and danger; and I therefore think it ought to be withdrawn.

Dated 3rd May, 1883.

From—MAJOR H. J. PEET, Deputy Commissioner, Lakhimpur,

To—The Assistant Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Circular No. 21, dated 5th April 1883, calling on me for a frank expression of my views on the provisions of the Criminal Code Amendment Bill.

2. You have indicated three lines on which the matter might be discussed—1st, that the Bill is good, and therefore must be passed coûte que coûte; 2nd, that is bad, and therefore must not be passed; 3rd, that, though good, it is unnecessary, and therefore should be withdrawn. I think there is a fourth view, which may and ought to be considered, and that is that, whether bad or good, the Bill must now, for political reasons, be withdrawn as speedily as possible.

3. It is simply impossible to exaggerate the ill that the introduction of this Bill has caused in an outlying district like this. I came out to India in 1860, when the old mutiny feeling was still strong. I learned my drill in the ruins of a bungalow at Agra, from which one of my elder brother officers and his family had escaped with difficulty from the mutineers. Natives were treated with scant courtesy in those days, but still there was no such feeling of intense bitterness as there is now between us and them, not even at Agra, Lucknow, nor Cawnpore. The feeling then was—I remember it well—that the natives had struck a blow for themselves, and had failed, and there was something of admiration for them in spite of the atrocities committed here and there. Gradually all feelings of bitterness expired, as things resumed their quiet course, and men began to half laugh at the ebullition of 1857-58, after the manner of Englishmen who have fought and done with it, or shook hands with our late enemies, and were perhaps better friends than before. Of late years, however, the policy of Government has been such as to put a stop to all rapprochement between the races. Quietly, insidiously but steadily, the so-called liberal policy has been introduced. I say so-called, because this is a matter which has nothing whatever to do with the party politics of England, which country of course bears no resemblance whatever to India. It is a policy expressly invented for India. Its base is empiricism, pure and simple; its avowed object, economy and removal of anomalies. Mistaken ideas of philanthropy have taken the place of sound statesmanship. Parsimony has been substituted for judicious economy. Who is likely to be the better carpenter—he who buys the best tools procurable, or he who provides himself with cheap makeshifts? It has been declared in deed, if not in word, that all men in this country of diverse nationalities (of all places in the world) are equal—than which perhaps no more foolish proposition was ever enunciated. I would hold that no two men are equal—certainly no two races; and if the question lie between the Natives of India and Englishmen, the matter of superiority, physical, mental and moral, is simply not worth the arguing. Bengalis may be superficially more clever, more apt in picking up the rudiments of a subject, but I never in the 23 years I have been in this country saw a really clever Bengali. Some of the warlike races may be as strong physically as our people, but they lack real intellect. And as for morals, what can be expected from an Asiatic cult? Ignoring all this, the Government have gradually ruled that Natives should replace Europeans in as many posts as it is at present safe to entrust to them. I wonder that the very fact of their having to make this reservation was not sufficient to deter the Government from pursuing their suicidal course. Where lies the danger of entrusting posts of authority to Natives? Honestly answered, the reply is rebellion, nothing less nor more. Then, if it is unsafe now to trust Natives, how much more unsafe will it not be when we have educated them and trained them to combined actions? Every one must know this, conceal the knowledge how he may; and year by year every one has felt this sensation of insecurity more and more; year by year more concessions have been made to Natives; year by year the prestige of the Englishman has been lowered—that prestige by which and by our bayonets alone we hold the country, till at last we have Natives on the High Court Benches, and in the Legislative Council, and elsewhere. All this was done silently, or nearly so, though we who live amongst non-officials know something of the spirit in which these signs of the times have been taken and read. The Native Races, though at the present time, should not be could not believe to be our generosity, but thought to be our pusillanimity. The English Press as a rule maintained a dignified silence; the English papers, in fact, "behaved very well," as a member of Council puts it. Still the breach between the people was widening every day, and now at last comes a distinct cause of quarrel—a battle-gage thrown down. There can be no mistake whatever about the English having picked up the glove. As for the Natives, I do not believe that one in ten thousand, or perhaps in a hundred thousand, knows anything at present about the quarrel, but those who do are no less eager for the fray than the English. It is a question not of Bábú this or that having the power to try Europeans; it is a question of "izzat—" the question on which the typical Native will beggar himself and his family rather than give in. The Government have flattered and petted and promised all things to the Native; they educate him almost gratis; they retain all his old privileges and give him more; they surrounded him with all kinds of protective laws against the rapacity and brutality of the European, until at last he really thinks he is the European's superior, and that he is within a reasonable distance of seeing India in the hands of the Indians. On the other hand, Englishmen have at last awakened to all these facts. Men who have sunk their fortunes and spent their lives in this country see now to what we are tending, and they have put their feet down and said—"Thus far shall this policy go and no farther."

4. But it is no use saying, as I see some of the journals say, that this a question only between Europeans and the Government. It is distinctly a question (as the Native papers readily recognise) between Europeans and Natives.

5. I hold that it is a question which should never have been raised, but, whether I am right or wrong in this view, I think there cannot be two opinions as to the necessity for the speedy withdrawal of the Bill. Be it in its inception good or bad, it has roused, and its countenance before the public is rousing, such hostile feelings between the races that the sooner it is consigned to oblivion the better.

6. By saying this I do not wish it to be inferred that I have no arguments against the Bill. I could adduce what I consider the very strongest argument to show that it is bad, and that, even if good, it is utterly unnecessary. But arguments of this kind can be found in almost all the papers in this country and in England, and in the speeches of some of the members of the legislature, and they have been put forward much more forcibly and eloquently than I could propound them, and therefore I consider that it would be mere waste of time to enter further on the subject. The only argument in its favour that now seems to be pressed is the "administrative convenience" one. One hardly knows whether to smile at the audacity which produces such an argument as applicable to the present state of things (every one of course knowing perfectly well that there is absolutely no inconvenience whatever), or to weep at the shortsightedness of the policy which is quoted in favour of the argument, namely, that in the course of years a large proportion—one-sixth—of the Civil Service must be Natives. I would most respectfully reply that "I do not see the necessity." I know this is the line laid down by Her Majesty's Government; but it does not follow that it may not be rescinded. The Government will not, I suppose, deny that it can raise the percentage to two-sixths or more. Can it not also reduce it one-twelfth or to nil? If it is shown, as it undeniably has been shown, that Englishmen will not have this amendment, and if the benevolent but mistaken policy of the Home Government will cause administrative inconvenience, the remedy is obvious—let the policy be changed.

Dated 30th April, 1883.

From—COLONEL W. S. CLARKE, Deputy Commissioner, Khási and Jaintia Hills,

To—The Secretary to Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Circular No. 21, dated 5th April 1883, Judicial Department, forwarding a copy of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, and requesting an expression of opinion on its provisions.

The Bill is strongly opposed, it is stated, by the influential body of non-official Europeans in the country, and it is desired that the views taken may be stated with precision in order that the Government may thoroughly understand on what grounds it is recommended that the Bill should or should not be persevered with.

2. Three principal lines of thought, it is suggested, may be followed in considering the merits or demerits of the Bill,—one, that the Bill is a good one, and the opposition to it so mistaken or factitious, that it will subside when sound reason resumes its sway; the second, that the Bill is bad in principle, and should not be adopted even if it were not unpopular; and the third, that the Bill, though sound in principle, is not of much importance, and that it would be unwise to proceed with it in the face of the genuine hostility which it has elicited. Further, it is suggested that, if thought necessary, the details of the Bill itself may be criticised.

In the third paragraph of your letter it is requested that the expression of opinion should be as frank and independent as possible.

These instructions allow of full liberty in dealing with the subject.

3. As a fact, not only are the influential body of Europeans opposed to the Bill, but the entire population of non-officials throughout India; and, if my experience and knowledge serves me to good purpose, I think it will be found that the majority of the official classes are equally strongly opposed to its introduction; it is a national, not a class, question at all.

4. I cannot conceive that the present opposition is of a description which will be overcome by time and the passing away of the excitement which has been caused. It cannot be supposed that it is either mistaken or factitious; indeed, it is very real, and there can be no mistake as to their opinions on the part of those who have been prominent in leading public opinion on the matter—men of education, experience and long residence in the country, who know well what they think, and why they think it. There is no reason to suppose the feeling will pass away; indeed, there is, on the contrary, every reason to suppose it will be increased until the European public are satisfied that the Bill is to be withdrawn; and then, it is to be feared, a feeling of distrust, which is very much to be deplored, will remain.

5. I do not think it would be good in principle to allow that the Bill is not of much importance; it is a measure affecting very closely the interest of the whole body of Europeans in India, and every European individually; and to decide whether it is, or is not, to become law by simply attributing unimportance to it, would be practically to beg the question. It should be now, once and for all, settled whether the principles inculcated by this Bill are applicable under the circumstances of our rule and the position of Europeans in India, so that the latter may rest for ever satisfied that the Government of India will not again, in any time which can at present be foreseen, urge the adoption of a measure which will make Europeans in India triable before Native Magistrates and Judges in the Mufassal.

6. In generations to come, when, by education, morality, character and civilisation, the Natives of India, men and women, become equals of Englishmen and women; when England and India are united as practically one nation; when the two peoples live together; when the existing hatred of the Christian religion and caste-prejudices disappear; when the lives of the two peoples, their modes of thought, their manners and their morality conform more to each other—such a result might be deemed natural; but this is a question of the remote future—a future so distant as not in the present time to make the question worthy of serious discussion.

7. I would not argue in respect of the Bill on the point of principle at all, or, at all events, not solely. Good policy as well as principles must necessarily be considered in connection with the introduction of all important legislative measures in India; and on the score of good policy the Bill most certainly cannot, it seems to me, recommend itself to Europeans of experience and knowledge and long residence in the country.

There is, in the first place, no necessity calling for an amendment of the law in this direction. Theoretically, there would be greater administrative convenience; theoretically and on principle, it appears right that no disqualification should exist on the part of the Native Judge or Magistrate. But are the natural feelings of the European to be entirely overlooked? Is the fact of the isolated position of the European in the Mufassal, and the special protection which is his due under the circumstances, necessary indeed to permit him to exist out here in safety, and to work for his subsistence, after having laid out his capital in the country, perhaps expecting to stay a lifetime in it, is the privilege heretofore enjoyed, of being subject to trial only before his own countrymen, not to be considered, and considered seriously? Is the prestige of the European, a very important factor in the discussion, to be lowered? For no one of experience can say that, in truth and reality, it will not be lowered, and that the Natives themselves will not consider it to be so. The prestige of the European is a very valuable aid and strength to the Government in India, and any measure which tends to lower that prestige tends to weaken the Government and its hold on the country and the people. It will be argued probably that such a measure will not humiliate the European; will not lower him in the eyes of the Natives of India. To this I reply that no person who has had a sufficiently long experience in the country, and been closely and for years in contact with its people, and has a knowledge of their character and habits, and knows how they have hitherto regarded the Europeans as belonging to a vastly superior race,—a race strong, humane, just and honest,—and how they regard their own people as wanting in all these qualities, would argue in such a strain; and the fact is, that persons wanting in the kind of experience required are totally unfit to judge in such a matter. They have no knowledge of conditions as they really exist, no appreciation of the position, and cannot understand why principles applicable to a wholly different state of affairs should not apply to the state of affairs in India.

8. The particular reasons given for bringing forward the amendment are the removal of an anomaly, administrative convenience and the impartial administration of justice. But anomalies must exist; they exist in India in every direction; they exist at home in England; they exist throughout the world.

Similarly, administrative inconveniences exist in almost every department, but such inconveniences are suffered, unless serious and calling for speedy removal. Urgency cannot be pleaded in this case most certainly; for many years to come Native Civilians might profitably be employed in districts where there are no Europeans, and there must be a very large number of such districts, and the appointment of Natives to districts especially suitable on this ground for their employment would be a much more reasonable mode of meeting the difficulty than amending a law which has after years of preparation only just come into force, and investing Natives with the power to try Europeans.

The impartial administration of justice is in no way affected by the Bill, and why any such reason was urged in the deliberation on the Bill in Council is inconceivable.

The desire to have this power on the part of a few Native Civilians, or the desire on the part of the Government in recognition of their education and general qualifications and position to confer it, are no good reasons. The whole question of the position of the European in India; the character not of the Native Judge, but of the Natives of the country generally, and the dangers and injustice to which a European would be liable to be exposed, must be considered; and lastly, the question of good policy, considering and acknowledging the truth as regards the basis on which British rule in India rests. England governs India by force of arms; and, however beneficent our rule, and however much we may wish the contrary were the case, this cogent fact must not, until it shall cease to be a fact, fail to be regarded. So long as England holds India by the sword, so long it is useless and unprofitable to talk of doing away with race-distinctions; the maintenance of race-distinction would be the more consistent policy.

No. 420, dated 28th May, 1883.

From—CAPTAIN H. ST. P. MAXWELL, Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Garo Hills,
To—The Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your circular No. 21 of 5th ultimo, asking for an expression of opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, introduced into the Council of the Governor General of India in February last.

2. In reply, I would state that, unless a very serious administrative difficulty arises, I would not recommend the adoption of the Bill. It stands to reason that an Englishman must understand an Englishman's ways of acting and thinking better than a Native of India, even if that Native of India was born and bred in England: the advantages become greatly enhanced when the latter has only resided in the foreigner's country for a far shorter period.

3. The Government of India, as is the case with the Government of any country where the governors and governed are of a different race and colour, is entirely dependent on the strength of its right arm. The word "loyalty," when referring to two peoples of this kind, has a different meaning: in the case of an European British subject, it means a fond heart towards the rulers of his own flesh and blood, whether they are in the ascendant or down in the mire; but the Natives of India can only be loyal to the Government of Great Britain so long as that Government is in power; overthrow that Government by a Government of their own, and I think he would be a coward indeed who would twit a man for transferring his affection to his own kith and kin.

4. However unpalatable may be the admission, the Government of India is the sword tempered by justice and mercy to the inhabitants of whatever colour or creed; it is impossible to suppose, with the agitation of the past four months before us, that the European British subject considers justice will be gained by permitting the Natives of India to hold criminal jurisdiction over him anywhere in the country; he fears greatly the result, for he knows that the tendency of a certain political creed is to level up, which in the present instance is to level down; and he also is aware that it is not possible for the Government in power to-day to bind its successors to-morrow. If the power to try the leading race is given to the few Natives to-day, it will be allowed to the many to-morrow, and the end of it will be that the non-official European will flee the country.

5. If the Natives of India are anxious to be tried by their own countrymen, by all means let them have their wish; but, as far as my experience goes of this country, the right of holding criminal jurisdiction over the conquering race is not desired by the Natives of India as a body, but is asked for by a few persons, who are of a people the reverse of brave, who are disloyal to the core, and who would be driven into the sea to-morrow if India was ruled as a colony.

6. I hope I may be forgiven for writing so plainly, but the Chief Commissioner in his circular advocates frank and independent comment; and I do so feeling confident that, if the amendment to the Bill is carried and the Bill passes into law, a great blow will be given to our prestige in India, and the hearts of 99 per cent. of the Europeans in the country will be filled with the utmost horror and dread.

No. 95, dated 9th May, 1883.

From—R. B. McCABE, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Naga Hills,
To—The Assistant Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Assam.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your circular No. 21, dated the 5th ultimo, forwarding copy of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, and in reply I beg to express my opinion on its provisions as follows:—

2. The Bill, in my opinion, is of too wide and sweeping a nature. Had the proposed change been limited, in the first instance, to the investment of Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service only with powers over European British subjects, I believe that very little opposition would have been raised. The formidable array of four classes whom it is proposed to create Justices of the Peace has caused European non-officials to see a future Judge in every subordinate Native official, and has engendered the bitter hostility to the Bill evinced by the tea-planters of Assam.

3. I have had five years' experience in two of the most important tea-districts of the Assam Valley, namely, Lakhimpur and Sibsagar; and during the whole of that period I mixed freely with the European planters. The one idea is that no Native can be an honest man, and that no decision at which he arrives is uninfluenced by bribery or personal considerations. Their opposition to the Bill, however much mistaken it may be, is not factitious, and, in my opinion, will strengthen with time.

The conditions of a planter's life tend materially to the creation of the spirit of hostility displayed against the Bill. Alone in an outlying garden, with none but Natives around him, he becomes dogmatical, and to a certain extent tyrannical. Underlying his confidence to his own powers there is always a latent fear that a false charge may at any time be brought against him.

This fear has hitherto been minimised by his knowledge that he would have a fellow-countryman for Judge, but now he sees looming in the future false charges preferred before a truculent and alien Magistrate incapable of entering into his habits and mode of thought.

4. The Bill has elicited genuine hostility, and the advantages to be derived from passing it will be more than counterbalanced by the irritation which it will engender.

5. Considered as a link in the chain of measures for the progressive advance of the government of this country, the Bill may be important, but I consider that the advantages to be derived from it independently are so insignificant that I would strongly urge that it be withdrawn.

From—SHIVRAM HARY SATHE and S. T. T. CHITLUNKAR, Secretaries, Puna Sarvajanic Sabha,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

We are directed by the Managing Committee of the Puna Sarvajanic Sabha to forward to you the accompanying memorial to His Excellency the Right Honourable the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council on the subject of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, and to request you to lay the same before His Excellency in Council for his favourable consideration.

Dated 23rd June, 1883.

To—His Excellency the Most Noble the MARQUIS OF RIPON, K.G., G.M.S.I., Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The Humble Memorial of the Native Inhabitants of the City and Cantonment of Puna in public meeting assembled

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists have watched with great interest the progress of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, which was introduced in the Supreme Legislative Council in February last, and which was on the 9th of March last referred to the Local Governments for the detailed consideration of the provisions of the Bill.

Your memorialists do not regret the delay which this further reference has caused in the final passage of the Bill through the Council. As several provisions of the Bill have provoked a violent panic and opposition in an important section of the community, this further reference is in consonance with the declared policy of Your Excellency's Government to allow a full hearing to all parties concerned in any proposed legislative measure. As the Local Governments have already approved of the principle of the Bill, your memorialists feel a just confidence that they will re-affirm the wisdom and justice of the proposed legislation, and suggest such improvements as will consistently carry out the traditional policy of Her Majesty's Government in India. Your Excellency has declared from your seat in the Council that no violence, misrepresentation or menace will ever induce Government to swerve from the path of duty, and this noble assurance satisfies your memorialists that, notwithstanding the violent agitation in certain quarters, the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure will ere long become the law of the land.

The present opposition to the measure has had its counterpart on previous occasions whenever the Government proposed any change in the law by which the invidious distinctions of race and colour were likely to be curtailed, and a practical equality of rights and privileges was sought to be established between all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The opposition is virtually founded upon a claim for the recognition of European British-born subjects as a superior caste with exceptional privileges. This claim, however, has been invariably negatived by Her Majesty's Government whenever it was advanced. The Court of Directors laid down the policy that there shall not be a governing caste in India, and this policy was affirmed by Parliament in 1833, and by the Indian Legislature in 1837, when Europeans were subjected to the civil jurisdiction of the Company's Courts. It was again re-affirmed in 1853, when the Civil Service was opened to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and in the proclamation of 1858, when a similar declaration was vouchsafed by Her Most Gracious Majesty.

The change now sought to be made was first proposed by the highest authorities in 1849, during the administration of the Marquis of Dalhousie, and again in 1857. The same proposal was again made in 1872, on the occasion of the passing of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, though it was lost by a small minority at the time, the subject could not finally rest on the basis then adopted, as it was inconsistent with the foundations of British supremacy in India, and the declared policy of the Crown and Parliament. The violent opposition that has been raised in certain quarters only furnishes an additional argument for abolishing all invidious distinctions which, so long as they are retained, demoralise the European section, and create uneasiness and discontent among Her Majesty's Native subjects.

The opposition in the present case is confessedly not so much against the particular measure under consideration as against the general policy followed by the Government of India during the last three years. That policy seeks to improve the political condition of the Native races and to promote their material prosperity. The opponents cling to the idea that several of the measures recently carried out will affect the vested interest and the monopoly of power they claim, and it is this circumstance which has aggravated the ill-feeling displayed by them. It, therefore, becomes more than ever necessary that Your Excellency's Government should persevere in its firm resolve to secure the final success of its noble policy.

Your memorialists will now briefly address themselves to the consideration of some of the principal grounds on which the present opposition is sought to be justified. The first of these grounds is that the privilege of being tried by Magistrates and Judges who are themselves European British subjects is a personal law with Europeans in this country, and that, as the Hindu, Muhammadan and Parsi communities have their own personal laws left intact, they have no reason to complain of the European community continuing to enjoy their privileges under a similar personal law. Your memorialists respectfully submit that such a special pleading is based upon an altogether misconceived notion. The Hindu and Muhammadan and Parsi communities do not, as is taken for granted, enjoy any special privileges whatever so far as criminal jurisdiction is concerned. In civil matters only, where the interests of other classes are in no way concerned, the Hindus and Muhammadans have their own laws, such as matrimonial laws and laws of inheritance and succession; but so do European subjects in India. No one asks for the repeal of the personal laws of inheritance, succession and marriage affecting Europeans as a community. It is to be remembered further that, while the Hindu and Muhammadan and Parsi communities have their own personal laws in common with the European and other communities for the adjudication of certain civil matters affecting them, they enjoy no privilege whatever as to who shall administer those laws. It is one thing to claim the benefits of a personal law, and quite another to claim that persons of a particular birth or nationality, and none other, shall administer that law.

Another ground which is urged against the proposed alteration in the Criminal Procedure Code is that it threatens with extinction the alleged inalienable birthright of Europeans of being tried by their peers. This contention is, your memorialists humbly submit, quite groundless, for this alleged birthright has reference to the trial by jury and not to the race or colour of the presiding Judge or Magistrate. The analogy attempted to be shown in favour of this contention from the practice followed in Turkey, Egypt, China, Japan and other foreign countries, where European subjects enjoy the privilege of being tried by special tribunals presided over by British Consuls, &c., is incorrect and not applicable to the Courts of this country, for the obvious reason that India, governed as she is by England, is not a foreign country with laws of her own. In Ceylon, which is circumstanced exactly as India is, the European settlers enjoy no such special privileges, which fact militates against the alleged inalienable character of the supposed birthright of Europeans. Another circumstance which proves the hollowness and absurdity of the extravagant theory is that, in the presidency-towns, European British subjects enjoy no such privilege, being subject along with their Native fellow-subjects to the criminal jurisdiction of the existing tribunals, no matter whether the presiding Magistrate or Judge be a Native or European. If the right were really inalienable, how can it be alienable in the presidency-towns and inalienable in the mufassal. Moreover, when European British subjects were allowed to settle in India, they were told that they should be subject to the same laws and institutions by which the Natives of the country were governed. Your Excellency's unequivocal declaration from your seat in the Council on the 9th March last, that it will not be your duty to listen to any arguments which were at variance with the declared policy of the British Crown and successive Parliaments, fills your memorialists with hopes that Your Excellency's Government will not swerve from the path of strict duty, but will, on the contrary, stand firm in giving effect to a policy laid down authoritatively and periodically re-affirmed by the Imperial Parliament.

The next argument of the opponents of the measure is that, if the proposed Bill is passed into law, it will deter Europeans from settling in the country, and thereby prevent not only the further investment of British capital in the mufassal, but will even tend to the withdrawal of that already invested. The utter collapse of all attempts to rouse English public opinion against the proposed legislative measure through the English Chambers of Commerce is a clear proof of the untenable character of this argument. As representing British investors of capital in India, these bodies, when appealed to, would not have declined to point out the evil tendencies of the proposed measure in this direction, if there had existed reasonable grounds for that apprehension. Similarly, wild fears were entertained when, nearly half a century ago, the European settlers in this country were subjected for the first time to the civil jurisdiction of the mufassal Courts, but the experience of the last fifty years has practically proved the extravagant character of those fears. Now, throughout the country the entire subordinate judicial service is, as a general rule, recruited from the educated Natives of the country, who exercise original civil jurisdiction over European as well as Native subjects living within their local jurisdiction. And no suspicion has ever been breathed regarding the character of the administration of justice by these tribunals. Your memorialists, therefore, confidently trust that the same beneficial results will follow from the enactment of the proposed measure, the wisdom of which will be acknowledged not only by posterity but even by the present generation, and the present agitation will cease with the passing of the final decision.

Another argument relied upon by the opponents of the proposed measure is that, if it became law, Native Magistrates and Judges would be swayed by race prejudices in trying European British subjects, and that false charges would be very frequently brought against Europeans by the Natives, who are alleged to be perjurers. It is with the utmost pain that your memorialists refer to this point. It serves to show the evil results of allowing special caste privileges to any particular class of subjects. Your Excellency's memorialists feel confident that Your Excellency's Government will treat with the contempt they deserve the gratuitous libels upon the integrity and honesty of the Native magistracy and upon the national character of the Indian races. If Hindu, Parsi and Muhammadan Magistrates daily administer justice to parties belonging to opposite races without a suspicion being breathed against their integrity and honesty, your memorialists fail to understand the reason why the very same Magistrates should be considered incapable to deal out even-handed justice to European British subjects. That the assertions against the integrity and honesty of Native Magistrates are recklessly made is conclusively shown by the fact that instances are not wanting of European British subjects having voluntarily waived their right of being tried by Magistrates of their own race in favour of Native Magistrates, such instances having occurred even after the present agitation had been set on foot. Again, if the allegations regarding the trumped-up charges supported by false witnesses were true, they would mean that, notwithstanding all the efforts of the British Government and its representatives in this country to bring about a cordial understanding between Europeans and Natives, the latter entertained for the former nothing but unmitigated hatred and hostility—a state of things which the veriest pessimist would not care to endorse. Your memorialists feel convinced that nothing but the natural hauteur and unreasoning pride of belonging to a conquering nation leads a certain class to indulge at times in wild assertions of the nature referred to above, and that the most effectual mode of ensuring the cordiality of feelings between all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in India is to gradually abolish all invidious distinctions founded upon race, colour and creed, so that all may feel their equality in the eyes of law. Thus a constant source of irritation and suspicion between the two classes would be removed, and, as a necessary consequence, the foundations of British rule in India would be greatly strengthened.

In conclusion, your memorialists express an humble hope that the proposed legislative measure will soon be passed into law, without any compromise of the great principle of justice and equity on which it is based.

Dated 21st June 1883.

To—His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council.

The Humble Memorial of the Orissa
Association at Cuttack

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your memorialists observe with feelings of gratitude and joy that a Bill to amend Chapter XXXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code, which judicially disqualifies Native Magistrates to try European British subjects in criminal cases, has been introduced into Your Excellency's Council. This step, your memorialists are aware, will tend to remove an invidious distinction and an anomaly in the administration of criminal justice in British India.

2. That your memorialists beg to state, clearly and emphatically, that a measure of this sort has always been in request amongst the Native community, and that they regard this Bill with watchful interests and profound solicitude as one fraught with vital interests to the nation.

3. That your memorialists fervently hope that, under the wise and liberal government of Your Excellency, this just and righteous Bill will ere long be passed into law.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

In continuation of my letter No. 4005, dated the 14th instant, I am directed to forward in original, for perusal if desired, 46 opinions of the officials consulted by this Government on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, and to request that they may be returned when no longer required.

2. I am to state that copies of the opinions of the Commissioners of divisions have already been transmitted to the Government of India with this Government letter No. 3232, dated the 14th ultimo.

3. The following is an analysis of the opinions of the officials consulted :—

In favour of proceeding with the Bill.	For not proceeding with the Bill.	In favour of continuing the jurisdiction to District Magistrates and Sessions Judges.	In favour of continuing the jurisdiction to competition civilians.	Suggesting some sort of compromise.	Approving of the principles of the Bill, but thinking its production premature.	Suggesting some modifications.	Total.

No. 645, dated 13th April, 1883.

From C. P. H. SHAW, Esq., District Judge, Belgaum,
To - The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, calling for my opinion on the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. I have again considered my letter No. 1072, dated 28th June 1882, and I see no reason to alter the opinion expressed therein. No doubt, the amendment proposed has caused a ferment amongst Englishmen in other provinces of British India, but in the Belgaum district there are only three aged pensioners of the British Army and two English missionaries other than public servants in civil and military employ, and I have had no opportunity of ascertaining what the feeling is amongst unofficial European British subjects in respect of the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code.

3. Assuming that Englishmen throughout British India are opposed to the alteration of procedure, I do not think the fact is any reason for postponing the amendment, so far as the classes named in the Statement of Objects and Reasons are concerned, though it may be, for the present, justification for not extending the Act to all Magistrates, first class, as I advocated.

4. I believe Native Magistrates generally are quite as trustworthy and impartial as are Magistrates in Malta, yet Englishmen in Malta are subject to the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates, and I believe with as little satisfaction, notwithstanding the Maltese Magistrates are Europeans, as they show to Native Magistrates in India (though I am bound to state that, in Malta, Maltese, not English, law is in force). The truth is Englishmen are not as free from race-prejudices as they fancy themselves to be, and this, too, while other races think Englishmen somewhat aggressive.

5. I am not aware that Englishmen are exempted from the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates in Ceylon, the Civil service of which is, I believe, very evenly shared by Singalese and Englishmen; and, before yielding to the clamour of Englishmen in India as evidenced by recent newspaper reports, I would suggest references to the practice in the different dependencies and possessions of Great Britain throughout the world; and whatever the result is, let the general policy of England govern the procedure in India. Neither Englishmen nor Natives of India could then have any just cause of complaint.

I have the honour, with reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd April 1883, to state that I have nothing further to add to my opinion already contained in my letter No. 2990, dated the 19th May 1882, which was to the effect that the power to deal with Europeans is vested solely in Justices of the Peace, and, so that Government kept the power of investiture in their own hands, only to be exercised specially and in favour of men who are eminently fit, I could see no objection to allowing Native officials to deal with Europeans, in the same manner as they now deal with them in Bombay.

From - H. T. OMMANNEY, Esq., District Magistrate of Khandesh,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to reply to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd ultimo, on the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. It would be a mere waste of time to endeavour to ring one more change out of the arguments that have been used at various times for and against the measure.

3. I shall content myself with giving my reasons in favour of the amendment.

4. About the abstract justice of the principle on which the amendment is based, there can be no question, and the change is therefore inevitable sooner or later. Such being the case, it is good policy to introduce it while the number of Native Magistrates qualified to receive the new powers at the hands of Government is small.

5. The change of the law does not confer the enlarged jurisdiction on all, or even a class of, Native Magistrates, but gives Government the power of conferring the jurisdiction on individual Native Magistrates. Of course, Government would not appoint a Native as District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, unless they were assured of his fitness for the duties which this Act will impose upon him. There is thus a guarantee that only fit persons shall be enabled to try European British subjects.

6. It is useless to indulge in generalities about the unfitness of Natives for the new jurisdiction, when we have seen Natives occupying the places of Chief Justice of the High Court in Calcutta and Judge of the High Court in Bombay. There will, of course, be a heavy responsibility on Government regarding the selection of fit persons for the positions of Justices of the Peace and the offices which carry that distinction. The terms on which the Magistrate lives with Europeans, his equals in position, will necessarily come into consideration in each case. A friendly and unprejudiced association with Europeans would seem to be a necessity to a Native Magistrate understanding the motives and receiving the confidence of all classes of Englishmen. I know certainly one Native Magistrate who fulfils this condition, though he belongs to a Native State.

7. I do not feel bound to discuss the various arguments that have been used in opposition to the Bill, and will summarize my reasons for supporting it, as follows:—

- (a) The abstract justice of the measure.
- (b) The inevitable necessity of adopting such a measure, sooner or later.
- (c) The good policy of doing so at once.
- (d) The fact that the measure allows for strict control by Government over individual appointments.
- (e) The fitness of a few Natives at the present moment not being doubtful.

No. 1, dated 18th May, 1882.

From—S. TAGORE, Esq., District Judge, Kanara,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to your letter No. 2985 (Confidential), dated 13th instant, I have the honour to state that, in my opinion, all the members of the Covenanted Civil Service, whether European and Native, ought to be placed on the same footing in regard to their powers of trying European British subjects. There is no valid reason whatever why the Native members of the Civil Service who have been to Europe and have qualified themselves to take their places with the European Civil Servants should not be allowed to exercise all the functions which the European members of the Service exercise. It seems improper and unreasonable to say that a Native civilian who had attained to the position of a Sessions Judge was not competent to try a European British subject whom a Native Justice of the presidency-town was competent to try, or that a Native civilian who is fit to be entrusted with the entire charge of a district should be considered unfit to hold the preliminary trial of a European criminal, particularly when his European assistant would be competent to hold such a trial. The distinction which now exists between the two classes of civilians in the matter under consideration is inviolous and unjust, and ought, in my opinion, to be done away with.

No. 552, dated 1st May, 1883.

From—S. TAGORE, Esq., Sessions Judge, Kanara,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258J.D., dated the 2nd April 1883, inviting opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I have the honour to refer Government to my letter No. 1, dated the 18th May 1882, on the subject, and to respectfully repeat my opinion that the law which creates a distinction between Native and European members of the Civil Service as regards jurisdiction over European British subjects is indefensible in theory, inconvenient in practice, and radically unsound. If the principle of admitting Natives of India into the Covenanted Civil Service is admitted, it cannot with any show of justice be contended that the Native Civil Servants should not be placed on a footing of equality with the European members of the Civil Service. It must be remembered that the only persons who will be entitled ex-officio to try European British subjects in the mufassal under the proposed Act are District Magistrates and Sessions Judges,—men who must necessarily be Civilians of 12 or 15 years' standing, men who must, from their very position and long experience, be presumed to be fully acquainted with the habits and customs of their European fellow-subjects and with the rules of etiquette obtaining among them. If such men are too incompetent to be invested with powers to sentence a European to a few months' imprisonment, it would certainly be the height of folly to entrust into their hands the life and liberty of millions of our fellow-subjects, who, dark-skinned though they be, are as much entitled to claim the protection of law and justice as the best born European British subject. It must further be remembered that the actions of these Magistrates and Judges will be keenly watched and severely criticised by the European community whenever a case against the European British subject is taken before them. The argument based on the absence of enlightened public opinion in the mufassal no longer holds good. As observed by Dr. Hunter in his speech in course of the memorable debate on the Bill—"Englishmen in the interior have now the means of expressing the public opinion of their class with such promptitude and with such force as to constitute the strongest possible guarantee against the abuse of magisterial powers whether vested in European or Native hands." It has been alleged that the question, whether a European criminal ought to be tried by a Judge of his own race, is a matter of importance to the criminal alone, and that Natives have no locus standi in respect of the question of jurisdiction. Here one important circumstance is ignored, namely, the administrative inconvenience likely to be caused by the operation of the present law. When the Civil Service has been thrown open to the Natives of the country there is every prospect of some of them being put in charge of sub-divisions and even of districts. Under the existing Procedure Code, this means that there are to be large portions of the country within which Europeans may commit even the gravest crimes with impunity, for the simple reason that their trials can never take place but in Courts far removed from the scenes of occurrence. To avoid inconvenience of this kind it would be necessary to exclude Native Civilians, as Magistrates and Sessions Judges, from the advancing districts into which British enterprise comes, and to condemn them to backward or remote districts, where they will have less opportunity of distinguishing themselves or proving their fitness for higher offices. In other words, "Government will have to regulate its appointments not by the merits of an officer nor by his general fitness for a district, but by his power to deal with a small exceptional class of cases occurring within it." The present step is a small and cautious one. The only alteration proposed is this: It is proposed "to substitute, for the disqualification arising from race, a qualification depending on tried personal fitness." "It amounts to this," as stated by Sir Arthur Hobhouse, the late Law Member of the Viceregal Council, in his letter to the Times, "that certain Government officials of long standing and of distinguished capacity shall not, because they are of pure Indian blood, be precluded from exercising over Europeans the very carefully-guarded amount of jurisdiction which is vested in other Provincial Magistrates." The same distinguished authority observes—"I cannot conceive that Europeans will be placed at any disadvantage on account of the partiality of a Native Judge, or that a Native Judge will be more prone to receive, or less quick to detect false accusations than an English or half-caste one." Indeed, it is difficult to understand what greater chances there are of miscarriage of justice in the trial of a European than that of an Indian criminal before a Native Magistrate, when the witnesses to be dealt with in both cases must belong to the same nationality, and the evidence to be sifted must present the same general features. The difference of nationality of the accused cannot reasonably be supposed to make any difference in the result, whether the trying authority be a European or a Native. The opposition to the proposed amendment, I submit, rests on no solid ground whatever, and is not justified by the result of concessions already made, in the face of similar clamorous opposition, to the dictates of reason, justice and sound policy. The Black Act of 1836 first subjected European settlers in the interior to the same civil tribunals as the Natives. That Act has now been in operation for nearly half a century, and no complaints are heard as to its working. Native Magistrates in the Presidency-towns try European British subjects without demur. Why a different result should be feared from the very cautious proposals for conferring criminal jurisdiction on certain specially selected Natives it is not easy to conceive.

Memo. by—G. WARRINGTON, Esq., Magistrate, Sholapur.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, Judicial Department, the District Magistrate of Sholapur begs to state that, with all deference, he would now wish to modify the opinion expressed in his reply to Government Resolution No. 2985, (Confidential) of 13th May 1882. In that reply he stated that, as Native Covenanted Civilians have in other respects been placed on a similar footing with European members of the Service, it would be anomalous to deny them judicial powers over European British subjects. This anomaly still exists, but, after a full consideration of the recent discussion of the question in the public prints, and of the state of public feeling therein displayed, the undersigned is strongly of opinion that the measure should be abandoned.

No. 2539, dated 11th April, 1883.

Memo. by—J. ELPHINSTON, Esq., Acting Collector and District Magistrate, Ahmadnagar.

The Acting Collector and District Magistrate of Ahmadnagar begs, in reply to the reference from Government as per margin, to submit a copy of a memorandum received from the Second Assistant Collector, Mr. P. C. Snow, of the Civil Service.

No. 2258, dated the 2nd April 1883.

2. Since writing on this subject last year, the views of the undersigned have become somewhat modified on the subject, in consequence of his perusal of the objections to the proposed alteration in the Jurisdiction Bill by Sir Fitzjames Stephen, Mr. Justice Jackson and the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

3. The undersigned now entirely agrees with the Bombay Chamber of Commerce in considering that in this country it is impolitic to introduce fundamental changes in the law affecting an important section of the population, unless such changes are justified by an urgent necessity, which is not now the case.

4. It is indisputable that, in this country, false complaints, backed up by false testimony, are far more common than in Europe or other countries. An instance has recently occurred in this district of such a case, where all the local bars were so far interested in the prosecution that no pleader at Ahmadnagar would undertake the defence of the accused. This was because it was a caste-dispute—"Bráhmán against Native Christian"; and in such cases no sympathy can, as a rule, be expected from the local bar up-country, who are mostly Bráhmans. There are, doubtless, some glorious exceptions, who are not at all likely to be won over by caste-feeling, intimidation or persuasion to act in the least contrary to justice and fair play; but, as laws are generally framed for the control of the majority rather than of the enlightened minority of mankind, it appears desirable to limit the trial of Europeans by Natives to the presidency-towns, where there are so many lawyers of different nationalities and persuasions that it will be impossible for the entire bar to be closed against any particular accused person. The above remarks are directed to the ordinary pleaders in a mufassal Court rather than to the bench of Native Magistrates; but they come from the same class of people, though in all probability a Native Magistrate, who has attained to the position of a District Magistrate or Judge, is better educated than the ordinary pleader. The question, however, at issue is, what is the public opinion of his class and what are the principles which guide his inmost thoughts? If these last are far higher and purer than those of ordinary Hindus, such an officer (if he be possessed of firmness sufficient to decide justly, no matter what influence may be brought to bear upon him) is, no doubt, qualified to try Europeans. It has been suggested that Native Magistrates would be more liable to acquit Europeans, knowing the prejudices or opinions against investing them with powers to try them at all. This is equally an argument against investing them with such powers, where the only qualifications of the Court are the ability to see on which side the truth is, whether with the prosecution or defence, and an unswerving determination to administer pure justice, no matter what the consequences.

Dated 10th March, 1883.

Memo. by—P. C. SNOW, Esq., Second Assistant Collector, Nagar.

I do not think the proposed change a good one, and imagine that the Bill in question would, instead of removing an anomaly, create several. Thus, for instance, if the proposed amendment had become the law of the land, it is most probable that cases would be constantly withdrawn from a Native Magistrate who ought to try them. This view of the case has been frequently quoted, the power of withdrawal, when necessary, has been dwelt upon, as one of the reasons why the proposed changes are unobjectionable. But such a state of things would appear to constitute a serious anomaly, and moreover, as time goes on, a dangerous one, inasmuch as race jealousies would be aroused. It is useless for me to dwell at any length on a subject which has been discussed from almost every possible point of view, so I shall merely add that, in my opinion, a Native, however well educated, is absolutely unfitted to try a European. To begin with, a Native Magistrate so often decides a case not on the clear and tangible evidence before him, but on what he supposes might have happened under the circumstances set out.

Secondly, he is quite incapable of appreciating a European's motives, or what has determined his course of action in particular cases. No temporary residence in England of two or three years will cure his defect. If it were possible to get Natives who had lived with Europeans from boyhood in Europe, the case might be altered. I do not believe that the main body of the people are in the least anxious to obtain for any of their Magistrates the powers proposed by the Bill; in short, the ordinary Native Magistrate in the Civil Service would probably far sooner not try a European if he could avoid it. The position of a Native Magistrate in a presidency-town seems to me quite different. His mind is permeated with European ways and ideas, and he has a strong European bar practising before him: under the circumstances, there is little fear of a failure of justice ensuing.

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, I have the honour to state that my reply to Government Circular No. 2985, dated 13th May last, sufficiently expresses my opinion.

2. As it was made when I was at Kaira, and I cannot give No. and date, I may explain that it was to the effect that Natives selected without subjection to any tests, and who had not necessarily ever been to England, might be wanting in the breadth of view desirable if they were to be empowered to try Europeans.

No. 1998, dated 12th April, 1883.

From—W. WOODWARD, Esq., District Magistrate, Nasik,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reply to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd instant, forwarding for opinion what is known as the "Native Jurisdiction Bill," I have the honour to state that I see no cause to alter the opinion already expressed in my answer to Government Resolution No. 2985 of 13th May 1882, which was in favour of the extension of jurisdictional authority over European British subjects to Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service. To this limited extent it seems to me, as an official, fair and legitimate that no distinction should be admitted between Native and European officers.

2. But, looking at the matter from a politico-social point of view, I am not disposed to support the measure. In itself it is practically unimportant, and the serious disturbances it may give rise to and the strong race animosities it may raise are far weightier and more significant than the only cause which has been urged for its adoption, namely, the removal of an anomaly.

No. 1445, dated 14th April, 1883.

From—W. ALLEN, Esq., District Magistrate and Agent, Governor, Panch Mahals,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to the Bill for the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, I have the honour to give my opinion as follows.

2. I think it would not be advisable to give the contemplated jurisdiction to Assistant Commissioners in the non-regulation provinces, nor to Cantonment Magistrates. It is certainly sometimes the case in non-regulation provinces that the control over those who administer the law is less strongly felt by them, and is consequently not so great a check as it would be in regulation provinces or nearer the seat of Government; and, moreover, it is often in non-regulation provinces that the cases in which the jurisdiction could be exercised would most frequently occur. I do not see on what grounds it is proposed to give jurisdiction to Cantonment Magistrates and not to Magistrates in general. There would be created a distinction which would be an anomaly of the same kind as is to be remedied by this Bill, and the only logical course would be to pass another Act extending the jurisdiction to all Magistrates.

3. I think it would be a dangerous piece of legislation to empower Natives to try British soldiers, and that, if the law is to be made, they should be specially exempted from the jurisdiction.

4. I think, however, in view of the fierce opposition it has excited, that the Bill is a mistake altogether, and ought to be withdrawn at once to allay the excitement that its introduction has raised. It appears from the Statement of Objects and Reasons that the object of the Bill is to remove an anomaly. There are, however, many anomalies that it is best to let alone. Our rule in this country is a far greater anomaly. The contemplated change would probably affect Europeans very little, and in practice the persons who found the authority most irksome and unpleasant would be the Magistrates and Judges empowered; but as the legislation is avowedly on a point of sentiment, is desired only by one or two individuals, is a matter of indifference to the mass of the Native population, and is bitterly opposed (foolishly it may be, but violently) by the whole of the non-official European community, it may be doubted whether it is advisable to perpetuate race animosity, to risk the loss of European capital, enterprise and intelligence already in the country and that might otherwise be attracted to it, and to create disaffection in a community (small indeed, but influential and of great importance to the stability of the Government) for the very unimportant result to be gained by the passing of the Act. If European capital and enterprise were to be checked by the alteration, a substantial loss inflicted on the general body of the Natives would be but poorly compensated for by a fanciful benefit to a very few.

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd instant, Judicial Department, I have the honour to report that, in my opinion, the proposed alteration of the Criminal Procedure Code is impolitic and uncalled for.

I am quite satisfied that, if carried into effect, it will appreciably diminish the amount of English capital invested in India.

I have seen the reply of my predecessor, Mr. Baker, to the reference No. 2985 of 13th May, 1882, and, as I agree with what is written in that reply, I think it unnecessary to add any further remarks.

No. 775P., dated 14th April, 1883.

From—E. P. ROBERTSON, Esq., Commissioner, Central Division, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to the Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, I have the honour to state that, in my letter No. 1345P., dated 29th June, 1882, I deprecated any change in the existing law as being unnecessary and uncalled for.

2. Viewing the subject by the light of the very grave demonstrations of feeling that have been shown by the European community, it is clear that the opinion already recorded by me was correct. I would now go even further, and urge that, as there is no necessity for the measure, it would be most impolitic to force the change, which all experience has proved to be most uncalled for.

3. It cannot be urged that it is called for, because the present law is a species of class-legislation. Were that an argument to be admitted, then all the special privileges that so many members of the Native community enjoy, such as immunity of certain classes from attendance at Civil Courts and the immunity granted to pardanashin women, &c., &c., must in common sense and justice be swept away. Were this done, the Natives, who enjoy the privileges of so much special class-legislation, would be the greatest losers.

4. Europeans prize greatly their privilege of being tried by Europeans, and by a jury of their countrymen before the High Court. While nothing practical is to be gained by a change in the law, much will be lost. The question is not one which affects the Bombay Presidency so much as other places, as in almost every place in this Presidency ready access to European aid and counsel could be obtained. Anyhow, the matter must not be dealt with in a sentimental manner. It is all very well to say that the Natives are fit for this and that duty; but they are not fit for all duties, and certainly they are not fit by training and experience to try Europeans. No Government has the right, merely for the sake of uniformity and as a mere matter of sentiment, to deprive any body of its subjects of one of their most highly prized privileges; and, if no better reason than mere sentiment and a desire to make the law uniform can be brought forward, the sooner all idea of any change in the law is abandoned the better. The proposal to change the law has already done much to undo the good feeling between the Europeans and Natives, and has overturned the labour of love and good feeling which has for the past 50 years actuated our best men. If the measure is pressed forward, it will widen the breach between the races, and the very first case in which a Native Magistrate deals unwisely and harshly with a European will cause a storm. It is only necessary to imagine a case in which a Native Magistrate should sentence a European to whipping, or a case in which a European female should be unjustly sent to a jail or lock-up. The storm which would break over Government would be such as Government could ill bear, while the race-antipathy would be so intensified as to defy all future attempts to allay it.

5. As the measure is unnecessary and uncalled for, and as no good can be derived from the change, why not leave good alone and let the law stand as it is?

No. 1929, dated 22nd May, 1882.

From—C. F. BOULTON, Esq., Magistrate, Karachi,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your circular letter No. 2985 (Confidential), dated 13th instant, calling for my opinion whether the distinction which now exists (and will be continued by the new Criminal Procedure Code) between European and Native Magistrates of the Covenanted Service, in regard to their powers of trying European British subjects, should not be abolished; and with deference I offer the following remarks.

2. The proposal appears to maintain the distinction between European and Native Magistrates of the Uncovenanted Service, and merely to relieve Native Covenanted Magistrates of their disability to try European British subjects. It is not, then, that any practical inconvenience has been experienced in the disposal of complaints against European British subjects, but simply a question whether the position of Native Covenanted Magistrates should be improved.

3. At present, a European British subject being a vagrant, and not otherwise, that is, a man of presumably low character, can be tried by a Magistrate who is not a European British subject. The proposed change, which abolishes this distinction also, is one that seems to lower the status of all European British subjects in India, and, therefore, in my opinion, it is not desirable, unless any very great compensating advantages arise from it in the other direction; and these I am not able to see.

From—C. F. BOULTON, Esq., District Magistrate, Karachi,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, requesting my opinion on the provisions of the Bill, proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. C. P. Ilbert, to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, and beg to refer you to my letter No. 1929, dated 22nd May last, in reply to Government confidential letter No. 2985, dated 13th idem.

No. 859, dated 19th May, 1882.

From—M. B. BAKER, Esq., Acting District Judge, Ratnagiri,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your confidential letter No. 2985, dated 13th May, 1882, in which you ask my opinion whether, with reference to Chapter XXXIII of the new Criminal Procedure Code, all members of the Covenanted Civil Service, whether European or Native, ought not to be placed on the same footing, and whether the distinction which now exists between the two classes in regard to their powers of trying Europeans, should not be abolished.

2. There are only two Native members of the Civil Service in this Presidency who entered by public competition, and, as I am not acquainted with either of them, my remarks must be based solely upon such acquaintance as I may possess of Native character. In giving reasons for the view I hold, I have no particular individual in my eye, and my remarks must not be construed as casting any reflection upon any member of the Service to which I have the honour to belong.

3. Looking at the question in the abstract, it may be urged with much force that, as all subjects of Her Majesty are governed by the same substantive law, so all should in like manner be made amenable to the same adjective law; but the points on the other side are so important as, in my opinion, to render it most unadvisable that the present distinction should be abolished.

4. The first objection which I see to the change is the very strong repugnance which will most certainly be felt towards it by the European population generally. This repugnance may be unreasonable, but it should not on that account be ignored. Discontent among the Europeans in the country might be a source of great political danger, and no such risk should be run simply for the sake of establishing a theoretical equality between Europeans and Natives. Every one who has had opportunities of judging knows what the feelings of non-official Europeans on this point would be, and how vehemently they would resent the notion of being liable to be tried by a Native official. I cannot think that the time has yet come when their ideas on this point should be forcibly reformed by the legislature.

5. Secondly, under the new system, Natives are admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service without having, as a rule, gone to England at all. Their knowledge of English manners and ways of thought are, therefore, wholly derived from books. The trammels of caste are still strong upon them; for, however much they may mix with Europeans, their domestic relations are still governed by the system in which they were born and have been brought up, so that it is but natural that they should regard any question from a narrow point of view. The effect of education has not been to break down class distinctions. An educated Native, however much he may despise the religious feelings of the less enlightened, does not feel that those who are lower in caste are any nearer to him.

6. Of late years much has been said about offences, such as assaults, committed upon Natives by Europeans. In some of these death has ensued, and, though it has been clearly shown that the accused has not been legally guilty of anything more than "hurt," an outcry has been raised, which showed that the Native editors (who may, as a rule, be said to represent the educated classes) have rather dwelt upon the alleged brutality of the European than upon the legal bearings of the case. The tendency has been, in some cases, to punish Europeans in cases of this sort with far more severity than was required, or would have been used, had both the parties been of the same race. Any one going through a bazar on market days will see many petty assaults committed by Natives upon Natives, of which, especially if the aggressor has any social or official standing, no notice is taken, though analogous acts done by an European would lead to his prosecution and a great outcry about his brutality. I feel sure that, in spite of education, a Native, if a high-caste man, would vigorously and forcibly resent the indignity of a Dher's shadow falling upon him, and I fear that he would still be ready to visit heavily any infirmity of temper in an European which might lead to an assault. Similarly, a Native Magistrate would be unusually strong if he could resist the temptation of punishing an European severely, knowing that he would thereby gain the applause of the Native journalists, who belong to the same class as himself. As a rule, Native editors are pleased when an European is convicted, not because they feel any sympathy with the injured person, but because the culprit is an European.

7. Offences committed by Europeans are rare. I do not remember having had to deal with more than four in the whole of my service, three of which did not affect Natives at all; so that it may be said that the objections which I have pointed out are chimerical. But it must be remembered that if a change is once made, it cannot be undone, and we have to look to a state of things in which Native Covenanted Civilians have no practical knowledge of English manners and ways of thought.

8. The objections to which I have referred would not be so apparent in the case of Sessions Judges as in that of Magistrates, who are, I presume, included in the term "judicial officers" used in your letter. A Native who had risen to such a position would necessarily have acquired considerable experience, and would have had more intercourse with Europeans. Besides, he would always have assessors to sit with him. But I question whether, from similar reasons, he would not be out of his element if he were called upon to hear an appeal in a case in which an European had been convicted.

9. It seems to me, too, that a great deal of what is written and urged by the so-called representatives of Native opinion has for its object the ascendancy of Brahmans rather than the good of Natives in general. A Bráhmaṇ would think little of seeing a Bráhmaṇ mucedadum striking coolies to make them work; but he would be full of indignation against an European engine-driver who boxed his servant's ears for not having his dinner ready when he came home worn out with many hours' work. No better example of the way in which Natives sometimes regard crimes can be found than in the applause which welcomed Wassudeo Balwant Phadke after his conviction in the Puna Sessions Court. Sympathy, then, was on the side of the accused in spite of the injuries which he had done to his countrymen.

10. No equality can exist between Europeans and Natives until the latter take the lead by establishing some equality among themselves. The distinction which exists as to the jurisdiction of the Criminal Courts has caused no hardship, and its abolition may cause mischief which would far outweigh any good which could arise from establishing a theoretical equality between the two races. The Code certainly does provide some safeguard, by application to the High Court; but it is a far cry to Bombay from the outlying districts of the Presidency.

In reply to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd instant, I have the honour to refer you to my letter No. 859 of the 19th May last, which I addressed to the Chief Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, on the subject, while I was Acting District Judge of Ratnagiri.

To—The District Magistrate, Ahmadnagar.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your No. 2446, dated 7th instant, asking my opinion on the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. The Government of India propose to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions. This reform, like all other legislative reforms, must be judged not by its sentiment but by its expediency. It has hitherto been thought expedient to maintain the disqualification for obvious motives based upon the precarious and anomalous position of the English in India, and I am not aware that anything has occurred lately to justify its abolition. It is true that education has made considerable progress, and that the Native officers who would be invested with magisterial powers over Europeans would be men of considerable education; yet education is not everything, and, in fact, is but a small factor in a very great social and political problem. The peculiar temper and habits of the two races are of much more moment, and deserve far more consideration than the mere fact how much education an officer possesses. The common sense to judge accurately of the facts involved in a criminal case, and the firmness to act righteously and to do justice, are, perhaps, all that is necessary in a Magistrate without any great degree of culture; but, if the proposal is that certain Natives only should be invested with powers, we would witness the anomaly of the Native officers, who had grown grey in dispensing justice blamelessly, declared unfit to exercise powers over white men which the young and untried Native Covenanted Civilian would possess. If Natives are to possess such powers, it would be perfectly inconsistent to give them to raw youths and discard the experienced elders and greybeards, who have worked so long and honourably in their careers. Why should the young and inexperienced Native Civil Servant have powers which will be denied to the ablest of the Deputy Collectors? Who are the Deputy Collectors except men, who, as a rule, have been promoted for tried merit, and men possessing University degrees, who do precisely the same work as covenanted assistants, and are treated like dogs in comparison; and are they in any degree worse than the Covenanted Native Civilian? Again, who are the mamlatdars but intelligent and experienced men, who have for years possessed magisterial powers which they exercise carefully and intelligently, and who are every day passing the higher examinations prescribed for the Covenanted Civilian? If it were merely a question of giving powers to the most efficient Native officers, nothing would be simpler than to bestow them upon men who have proved themselves to be the most worthy in the actual business of life, and not upon mere scholars or upon the scions of the Native Civil Service with their supposed pretensions to nobility. It is obvious, as I have said, that education is a very small factor in this question, and that the proposed reform, instead of settling the question at once and completely, would be merely the beginning of far greater changes. The proposal in the present form is merely to give certain powers to certain Natives, not because they are more fitted for their exercise than other Natives of greater experience and practised intelligence, but because they hold a certain position, and it is thought expedient to break down the distinction in this respect between the Covenanted English and the Covenanted Native officer.

In this view, the feeling of the European community has apparently not been considered, or has counted for nothing, but the frantic yell of disapprobation with which the proposal has been greeted has shown that the feeling of this community counts for something, and that it is deserving of some consideration. It is not a question whether these feelings are right or wrong, worthy or unworthy; the fact is, that the feeling of social difference between the two races is so distinct and marked and pronounced, that it is advisable to consider, before exciting them or wounding acute sensibilities, whether any worthy end is to be attained which will justify the Government in braving a popular outburst in order to attain it. There are many actions, very harmless in themselves, which are yet resented bitterly by persons who happen to attach undue importance to them. An Englishman walking into a Hindu temple to admire its architecture might unconsciously be risking his life when a fervid Hindu might consider his intrusion as an abominable desecration. Going into a mosque or tomb with boots on might excite a fanatic Musalman to violence, and the great shoe question has gathered round it an angry and stormy literature full of ominous mutterings and lurid wrath. There are some persons who can regard all these displays of temper with philosophic indifference, but the Europeans in India are not a collection of philosophers. Like the Vere de Veres, they have the passions of their kind, and, perhaps, it would be just as well to refrain from rousing these passions unnecessarily.

I presume the proposed reform can be defended on the ground that the trial of Englishmen by Englishmen produces great administrative inconvenience, and that it inflicts a great wrong upon the Indian people, which should be redressed. If it were true that this privilege caused a wrong to the Indian people, there might be some reason for abolishing it, but, as a fact, it is a mere matter of procedure and not of substantive law. When the Penal Code was passed against the protests of the European community, the Government very properly were firm in declaring that there should not be one law for the Native and one for the European, that there could not be two definitions of the same offence, and that both persons should be liable to the same punishment. But, as a matter of procedure, it left the execution of the law upon Englishmen to be carried out by Englishmen.

At first it was not very difficult to require that all cases against Europeans should be tried by the Supreme Courts at the presidency-towns under the safeguards afforded by the time-honoured system of trial by jury. But after a time the great number of Europeans who settled in the mufassal made it necessary to amend the law, and English Magistrates and Judges in the interior were empowered to try Englishmen, and pass certain light sentences upon them. If these powers are not enough, they may be increased, but I can see no reason why Natives also should have these powers. The places where English settlements are to be found are not many, the offences which the English are known to commit are very few, and with the exception, perhaps, of parts of the tea and coffee plantations, the settlements are all accessible by rail. With rare exceptions, there is not a place where an offender could not be placed before an English Magistrate in 24 hours. Kanára has been referred to, to point the inconvenience, but that difficulty is now fast disappearing, for the railway will shortly be opened, and communication will be opened north and south. In fact, every new mile of railway and every new span of telegraph helps to weaken the objection on the ground of inconvenience. If it is possible with rapid communication for a smaller army to hold a larger territory, it is also possible for fewer civilians to superintend larger areas than formerly; and within a few hours of the arrest of an offender the Magistrate and the criminal can now be brought together from widely different points.

Administrative inconvenience, therefore, there is really none, and, whatever there is, is rapidly disappearing. There is no wrong to the Indian people in requiring that Englishmen shall be tried by Englishmen, and, on the whole, this plan secures a firmer administration of justice than perhaps would be possible in the hands of Natives. Is it necessary, then, merely, for the sake of abolishing a distinction between Covenanted Native and Covenanted English officers, to make a reform which is not essential, in order to remedy a grievance which no one feels? The educated Native would easily understand that, if he is not entrusted with this power, it is not because he is not fitted to exercise it, but because it is not expedient that he should do so. The time may come when high Native officers will mix more freely among Europeans, and will be received upon a better social footing; and it is possible that a free intercourse may soften and ultimately remove prejudices and antipathies about which there can be no mistake at present. When that time does come, then a reform, which is now objectionable, will pass unchallenged, and will not want supporters. Till then nothing will be lost by it being postponed.

But if it is considered necessary to make some immediate advance towards that end, then the suggestion which has been made in the papers might be considered, and the accused may have the option of objecting to be tried by a Native Magistrate. The objection should be allowed not at the beginning of the enquiry, but on framing the charge, for, if the enquiry disclose no prima facie case, the Magistrate would discharge the accused; but on framing the charge he should inform the accused that he is at liberty to object to the Magistrate going on with the case. If the objection is raised, the case should be transferred to an English

Magistrate, who should take up the case at the point at which it has been stopped, or recall the witnesses at his pleasure, or the Native Magistrate may, notwithstanding the objection, go on to hear and record the evidence for the defence, and then forward the proceedings with his opinion to an English Magistrate, who, if he concurs with the Native Magistrate, shall acquit the accused or pass sentence upon him, as the case may be; if he does not concur, the papers should be forwarded to the District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, if either of them is an Englishman, for disposal and final orders. In cases committed to the sessions, when the Judge is a Native officer, he should be assisted by assessors who are Europeans, or by a jury of Europeans. These suggestions, while they would afford the Native officer an opportunity to conduct the proceedings, would yet require that the guilt of the accused should be established to the satisfaction of one or more Europeans.

Memorandum by J. ELPHINSTON, Esq., District Magistrate, Ahmadnagar,—No. 2779, dated 21st April, 1883.

In forwarding this opinion of the City Magistrate on the subject of Government Resolution No. 2258, dated the 2nd instant, the Under-Secretary to Government in the Judicial Department is aware that only his own opinion was asked for. Mr. Hamilton is, with Mr. Snow, the only officer of pure European descent at present subordinate to the undersigned; it is, therefore, thought that his opinion may go for what it is worth as a representative of the class about whom Government propose to legislate in the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure.

No. 1497, dated 24th April, 1883.

From—H. E. WATSON, Esq., District Magistrate, Upper Sindh Frontier,
To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd instant, I have the honour to state that, since I replied to Government Resolution No. 2985 of 13th May last, the question as to whether certain Judges and Magistrates should be given jurisdiction in the mufassal over European British subjects, has been most fully and publicly discussed, and, considering the arguments adduced and the strong opposition there is to the Bill, I am now of opinion that it is not advisable to invest Natives with such jurisdiction. As the arguments against the Bill have been published and are well known to Government, it appears unnecessary for me to repeat them here, and I imagine that under the circumstances, a simple expression of opinion is all that is required of me.

Memorandum by G. W. BORRADAILE, Esq., District Magistrate, Broach,—No. 1091, dated 16th May, 1882.

In obedience to confidential No. 2985, dated 13th instant, from the Chief Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, the District Magistrate, Broach, has the honour to express his opinion that fitness to be vested with certain powers should not depend on membership of the Covenanted Service.

2. If all members had entered by the same straight and narrow gate of competition, something might be said against creating an invidious distinction by refusing Natives the same jurisdiction as Europeans.

3. But, when some are entering in through the broad and easy way of private patronage, without having shown by any test their fitness for membership, the inadvisability of vesting these with the jurisdiction denied to those who have lacked the influence necessary for their appointment is obvious.

4. Whatever may be said in favour of vesting with the jurisdiction those who have entered by competition, there is very much more to be said against it, and personally the undersigned is opposed to any Native being so vested.

5. But he can conceive of no reason for so vesting, merely because they belong to the Service, all the Natives who are brought into it by luck or favour through nomination.

No. 140, dated 26th May, 1882.

From—MAJOR R. S. CRAWFORD, Deputy Commissioner, Thar and Parkar,
To—The Acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

Replying to your confidential letter in the Judicial Department, No. 2985 of 13th May, 1882, I have the honour to submit an opinion that, as regards the provisions of Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, it is inexpedient that all members of the Covenanted Service, whether European or Native, should be placed on the same footing until all the latter, besides acquiring an European education, shall in their private lives have put on the manners and customs of Western nations.

No. 161, dated 26th April, 1883.

Memo. from—MAJOR R. S. CRAWFORD, District Magistrate, Thar and Parkar,
To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to the Resolution of Government in the Judicial Department, No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, calling for opinion on the subject of the proposed Jurisdiction Bill, the District Magistrate, Thar and Parkar, has the honour to report that, as he was opposed to the measure mooted in Government Circular No. 2985, dated 13th May 1882 (vide District Magistrate's Confidential report No. 140, dated 26th May 1882), so also his opinion is that the present Bill should not be passed.

No. 411, dated 24th April, 1883.

From—A. H. SPREY, Esq., District Magistrate, Kaira,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

As directed in Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, I have the honour to express my opinion on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects. The subject has been so discussed in every part of India in all its bearings, that I am unable to put it in any new light or to add any fresh argument. I can only state my own views upon it. I would wish it, however, to be understood that I have no personal prejudice about the matter. If it happened that I had to be tried for any offence, I do not know any single Native Judge or Magistrate, first class, in this Presidency, whom I should doubt doing justice to me simply because I happened to be a European. I base my views on the grounds of necessity, expediency and policy.

2. The Bill is admittedly one to cure an anomaly. The British rule in India is full of anomalies, without the existence of which that rule could not last for a single day. I fail to see that the anomaly in question is greater than very many others, it certainly does not curtail the liberties of the general Native public in India, as many other anomalies necessarily do; and, by doing away with it, I do not see that any single Native British subject will be made a little the happier. I put out of the question the sentiments of agitators and would-be patriots of the advanced school, to whom anything that depreciates the European is a source of happiness; on the score of necessity I see no cause for amending the present law.

3. Had the Bill been brought under consideration at any other time, it would not have so much mattered, and it might even have passed into law without causing much commotion, or stirring up bitter and excited feelings. But to my mind the present time has been a most unfortunate one. During the past year, the whole attention of the Natives of India has been drawn to projected reforms in the shape of local self-government and other matters. Whatever the very small minority of educated and enlightened Natives may think of these reforms, they surpass the wildest imagination of the great masses of ordinary Natives, who have traditionally looked upon the "Sarcar" and its servants, the district officers, as the originators and wielders of all power and influence. They have scarcely begun to comprehend the bearing of these reforms, which tend to deprive European civil executive officers of the power and influence they have hitherto held, when this Bill makes its appearance, and looks to them as if Europeans were to be levelled down to the status of Natives. To their view, there has been a general cheapening of the Europeans, which I cannot look upon except as fraught with trouble, if not absolute danger, in the future. The English do not hold India by actual force so much as by prestige. If we now go deliberately destroying that prestige, we may to our cost find our hold on the Natives very insecure. For these reasons I look upon the Bill as not expedient and impolitic.

4. I beg to append the opinions of Mr. R. M. Kennedy, Divisional Magistrate, and Mr. Modi, first class Magistrate, to both of which I would invite attention.

No. 353, dated 12th April, 1883.

From—R. M. KENNEDY, Esq., Assistant Collector, Kaira,
To—The Collector of Kaira.

I have the honour to report with reference to your No. 343 of 9th April.

2. So many arguments on both sides of the question have been set forth in the papers, English and Indian, that it is, on the one side, extremely difficult to offer any report within reasonable compass, and, on the other, I am loth to take up your time by inadequately stating what has already been much better stated over and over again.

3. For my own part I regret that the Bill has been introduced.

(a) The law at present in force as to European British subjects constitutes a privilege, and does not take away jurisdiction. The privilege is one which, whether useful or not, for its own sake is useful in this country to emphasize the caste of the possessors of it, and, as such, is rather regarded with pleased acquiescence than with disfavour by the greater part of the people with whom I have come in contact. To abolish caste would undoubtedly be satisfactory to all, and specially so to myself, but this would raise a howl throughout the length and the breadth of this district, and any beginning in that direction would be the reverse of pleasing to the Hindus, and, when done from the top, would be really disastrous; for, though I cannot admit that caste is self-respect, I am prepared to admit that want of caste occasions want of self-respect. And who are they who clamour for the change in the law? Hindus who have visited England, who by limited intercourse with lawyers of advanced views (I think I am right in saying this is the only society seen by Hindus in England) have learnt to see grievances

* I must carefully except Parsis who visit England with their parents and families, and who, as residents, have opportunity of seeing first class society. others would not see, and who cannot be regarded as in any sense leading opinion in India, where they are outcasted for their pains on return.*

(b) Secondly, the Bill will undoubtedly shake the confidence of all British men in the law—a great disaster in it itself, and just now likely to be more disastrous, when a scheme for local self-government is on its trial, which may, and probably will to further self-government, and when it is particularly desirable that all classes should pull together.

4. However, the Bill has been introduced; and such being the case, it only remains to make the best of it. To withdraw it altogether would, under present circumstances, be objectionable, as it could hardly be withdrawn without attracting observation; those indifferent to the Bill as to its merits would, I should fear, object very much to see it withdrawn. The Bill as it stands will, I hope, work satisfactorily for the ends of justice, and I may note that no real hardship could well be inflicted (a) if sections 408 and 416 are retained as they are in the present Bill, and (b) as Magistrates able to try European British subjects are to be Justices of the Peace, and therefore Taluká Magistrates, who would be prone to undue leniency as a rule, and would be subject to prejudice on special occasions, would be excluded. In Natives of Her Majesty's Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Service who are experienced Magistrates, I venture to think, complete reliance may be placed.

No. 121, dated 14th April, 1883.

From—B. E. MONT, Esq., First Class Magistrate, Ahmadabad,
To—The District Magistrate, Kaira.

With reference to your No. 343 of the 9th April 1883, desiring opinion on Mr. Ilbert's Bill for extending the criminal jurisdiction of Native Civilian Sessions Judges and District Magistrates and Assistant Collectors of approved qualifications over European British subjects, I have the honour to submit as follows.

Theoretically, the rights of men should be considered as equal everywhere; the white men have no rights superior to those of the negro slave, the Briton has no rights superior to those of the Hindu, and the twice-born Brahman must not be considered superior to the Bhangi and the Dher. But if we proceed upon the equality of the rights of man, then, in order to be consistent, we should not have the British ruling over us; we should be governing ourselves, and should have a republic, though it may be a question after what model that republic should be formed; for all the philosophers of the eighteenth century could not succeed in guiding the French people to choose a republic that was not worse than a despotic monarchy. We see that the principles of equality, liberty and fraternity cannot be followed in connection with the Government of India; we must make expediency our guide, though, perhaps, there may be some who would argue that whatever is not just cannot be expedient. I do not want to enter into any exposition of what is meant by right and just, but I need not say that all common-sense people understand what is meant by expedient. It means that which tends to secure the greatest amount of happiness and content under given circumstances.

The grounds on which I would dislike the proposed legislation are—

First, that there is no necessity for it, and second, that the mischief that would be caused by it, by creating race-feeling, would be quite out of proportion to the benefit that might be gained by courting popularity, so to speak, and by abolishing the "anomaly."

With regard to the necessity for the measure, it has been admitted, even by His Excellency the Viceroy, that there is not any great administrative inconvenience felt at present, but that he wants to provide for the future, when there will be many Native District Magistrates and Sessions Judges. Now, without going so far as to say that it was not a good policy to have yielded to the cry for the indiscriminate admission of Natives into the civil service, I would submit humbly that, even were all the District Magistrates and Sessions Judges Natives, still it would not cause much inconvenience if they had not the power to try European British subjects. In this Presidency, the number of Europeans is comparatively very small, but in the Bengal Presidency there is a large population of European planters and indigo-factors; and it has been said that these gentlemen often lose their temper and not unfrequently cause the death of mild Hindus, and that, owing to the necessity of going before the Calcutta High Court, justice is often defeated. I do not believe that such is the case. I cannot conceive how, owing to the necessity of going long distances, the witnesses would give false evidence. If anybody suffers more than another when a trifling case is tried before a High Court, it is the accused, who is upon his trial, and who has to give large fees to his counsel.

With regard to the mischief caused by stirring up race-feeling, one has only to read the accounts of the meetings of Europeans held at different places, and also of the meetings of Natives in some places. And why all this great trouble? for what good? Simply for the sake of sweeping away an anomaly! But it should be noticed that this sweeping away of the anomaly will not tend to make the Native an equal of the Englishman. It will not increase his loyalty towards the throne of our august and beloved Queen Empress; it will only tend to give a few Natives who will be fortunate enough to be District Magistrates and Judges the satisfaction of knowing that they can sit in judgment upon one of the conquering race.

And in this place I would humbly state that I do not agree with those who argue that the Natives will not administer justice evenly and honestly towards Europeans. The fears expressed in several quarters, that the Europeans would fare badly at the hands of Native Judges, should be dismissed from our mind at once. English education as given in Indian schools and colleges, and the contact with European professors and teachers, are sufficient to ingrain into the nature of the Natives the principles of honesty and straightforwardness. Why the Europeans should oppose this Bill is not that the Natives will not be just in their administration of the law, but because it would lower the prestige of the ruling race, and it would wound his pride. And let us see what is the position of the Native towards the European. The latter, coming to India for securing its commerce, found himself vastly superior to the Native in every respect—in the ability to carry on large commercial transactions, in the art of navigation, and in military tactics and personal bravery and bodily strength, and in the art of conquering other nations and governing them justly. The Briton, finding himself superior to the Hindu, conquered him, but he is just as well as powerful and strong; and he has therefore governed the other in such a way as to increase his happiness a hundred-fold. Of course, the Natives now forget from what condition they have been raised up by the Briton, and what blessings they now enjoy; but such is always the case. They would be happy if only they know what good things they have. But is it becoming in a Native now, when he has been taught by his benefactors how to cultivate his intellect, to turn round and say that he is not at all inferior to the other? It should, however, be remembered that the cry of equality is raised only by those who want to be the equal of their superiors; these same liberal-minded persons would be greatly shocked if it was suggested to them that the persons inferior to them in social position wanted to become their equals. Let us consider what the Bramins would say to Dher and Bhangi Magistrates. Let us also consider how the Natives wanted the Shastris and Kazis to expound their laws; let us consider how the Parsis prize the privilege of having Parsi delegates in the adjudication of their matrimonial cases; and let us also consider how the Surat Nawabs had by law the power of deciding all cases affecting the members of their household. We see everywhere that there is a pride of race.

“Order is Heaven’s first law, and, that confessed,
Some are, and must be, greater than the rest.”

Against me personally it may be said that, when I thus write in opposition to the Bill, I, being a Parsi and an alien, have no patriotism, and that I am influenced by the fact that the Parsis have benefited greatly owing to the British. I may say that we have been in India for more than thousand years; we have been here before the time of Hengist and Horsa. I may also say that, if we have benefited owing to the advent of the British, so much the more reason that we should be content with our present subject condition. I may, however, be pardoned for indulging in a little personal pride that our own family has, instead of rising, only fallen in influence owing to the introduction of the several laws and regulations; but we have always been devoted to the British cause from the time that the first factory was established at Surat, and more than a hundred and twenty-five years ago two of our ancestors were killed by the seceders from the Surat Castle for rendering assistance to the British who were besieged in the factory. We were devoted to the British because we consider them a superior race; and I have no hesitation in saying that the Natives will be happy only as long as they feel that their rulers are a superior race. To the Brahmans the other people are bound to bow; but the Brahmans themselves never bow, they never raise their hands for salam, but they only extend them and give their blessings: the Sayyads extend their hands to be kissed by the other Muhammadans, but they never kiss the hands of the others. Now when there are such race-distinctions among the Natives themselves, why should they not make any difference between themselves and the ruling race. But a few Bengali Babus might say that they have discarded all the Native notion of inequality among men; a few Bengali Babus, however, are not the whole of India.

If the European population in India do not object to the Bill, then by all means let it be passed, but I would submit that it should not be passed against their wishes. We should not displease them. It has been pointed out by a very able defender of the Bill, Sir Arthur Hobhouse, that, when the Native Judges were invested with the power to hear and decide civil cases in which Europeans were concerned, there was the same amount of agitation and opposition from the Europeans of India, and that all sorts of evils were prophesied. I admit that all the evils now predicted by the Europeans will never come to pass; but I should earnestly desire that some deference should be paid to their race-prejudices.

No. 1620, dated 2nd May, 1883.

From —A. KEYSER, Esq., District Magistrate, Kolaba,
To—The Commissioner, Northern Division, Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd April, 1883, circulating a draft Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, I have the honour to forward the reports of Mr. W. F. Sinclair and Mr. A. W. Hughes, Magistrates, first class.

2. I have little to add with them. I agree with Mr. Sinclair, except as regards the advisability of giving powers to Native Civil Servants who have attained their position by passing the competition in England.

3. I think no change is necessary. No administrative inconvenience has been felt by the present inability of Native Magistrates in the mufassal to try Europeans, and I do not think any is likely to occur in any future sufficiently near to make it necessary to legislate for it.

4. In the solitary district where the Magistrate of the district is likely to be a Native, or the few districts where some of the Sub-divisional Magistrates are Natives, there are sure to be other European Magistrates qualified to try the very few cases that occur where the defendants are British subjects of Her Majesty.

5. The reasons which have always existed for granting the European British subjects certain privileges still exists, and the arrangement that in a British dependency administered by British officers they should not be subject to the jurisdiction of any Magistrates but those of their own race, is such a natural one, that I think those who advocate the change should have much stronger arguments to support it than such academic or sentimental ones as are derived from the "anomaly" of the present state of the law (unless all distinctions between Natives and Europeans in Criminal Courts is to be done away with, which is not suggested—this would still exist), or the supposed injury to the feelings of a few highly placed officials, because they are not to try, say, once every five years, an Englishman who prefers to be tried by his own countryman, the latter being ceteris paribus better qualified to conduct the enquiry.

6. The feelings of those directly affected by the proposed change are certainly a more weighty subject for consideration, and, after it has been almost unanimously condemned by the whole non-official British community in India, there can be no doubt as to what they are.

7. Every Englishman in this country is regarded by the people as a representative of his Government. The spectacle of one of the "sahib log" hand-cuffed and sent to jail by order of a Native Magistrate is scarcely calculated to increase the prestige of the British Government, or strengthen a rule of which the consideration in which the ruling race is held by the populace is not the least support.

8. I submit these remarks, fragmentary and inadequate to the subject as they are. The matter has been so fully discussed in the Press and elsewhere, and my view of the matter so forcibly stated by Sir J. Stephen and other distinguished men, that I feel it would only be a waste of the time of Government for me to submit a report discussing the propriety of the proposed legislation at the length the subject deserves.

No. 27, dated 13th April, 1883.

Memorandum by—A. W. HUGHES, Esq., Magistrate of Alibag.

The undersigned, with compliments to the Collector of Kolaba, has the honour, in reference to his memorandum No. 1341 of 8th instant, to remark, in the matter of the proposal to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882 so far as relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, that, as regards clause (a) of section 1, no amendment appears to be necessary. Europeans of all grades resident in India would no doubt very much prefer exercise of jurisdiction over them to be with their own countrymen, instead of with Natives of the Covenanted Civil Service, however highly educated and in other respects fitted for the proper discharge of their duties. If the power it is proposed to give to Native Civilians were granted, there would perhaps for the first few years afterwards be a tendency to undue leniency in their dealings with accused persons of European descent, but after that the probability is it would be the reverse, more especially if at any future time circumstances were to occur which would have the effect of stirring up race antagonism and strife, such as recent events have shown lie unfortunately only in a dormant state.

It is the candid opinion of the undersigned that, taking into consideration the relationship as existing between Great Britain and its extensive dependency, India, it is not expedient to legislate as is proposed by Mr. Ilbert's Bill; and, if this applies in the case of the highly educated Indian Covenanted Civilian, much more must it do so to the members of the newly constituted Native Civil Service, and others coming under clauses (b) and (c) respectively of section 3 of the Bill, who do not even possess that veneer of European civilization which the Indian Covenanted Civil Servant, from his three or four years' residence in England, is supposed to have acquired.

As regards the appointment of Native Civilians to Cantonment Magistracies with reference to clause (d) of the same section, the undersigned believes that such would be eminently distasteful even to the Native officers and men of the Native regiments, and, as a natural consequence, infinitely more so to the officers and men of British regiments. From the above remarks it will be considered unnecessary for the undersigned to offer any opinion upon the repeal, amendment or substitution proposed in sections 2 to 5 of the Bill.

No. 190, dated 12th April, 1883.

Endorsement by—M. PHELAN, Esq., District Magistrate, Kolaba.

Forwarded with compliments.

Taking the sections as they come 1 (a).—This refers to Native gentlemen who have gone to England and beaten Englishmen on their own ground. They have, moreover, been obliged to study English law in English Courts; and if they are fit for the service at all they are fit for all its duties. Undersigned cannot see why they should be on a separate footing from European Covenanted Civilians.

(b), (c).—These two classes of officers are as alien from an European in habit of thought as inhabitants of another planet. They cannot understand an European accused, nor he them; and the Court and accused would be, if the latter were undefended by counsel, at cross-purposes the whole time. As a body, these officers in this Presidency do not seem to want the powers; and no inconvenience is caused by their not having them. Undersigned feels bound to say that they would be far more likely to err on the side of undue leniency than the other way.

(d) Cantonment Magistrates.—Undersigned is very strongly of opinion that the appointment of a Civilian Cantonment Magistrate of any sort is a mistake and leads to friction.

The appointment of a Native Cantonment Magistrate would probably lead to a very undesirable state of mind not amongst European troops only, but also in the Native regiments.

It is difficult to suppose that such an appointment can have been seriously contemplated; but perhaps the draughtsman had in his mind's eye the collapse of a case in Madras some ten years ago, on the discovery of a clever vakil, that the Magistrate was technically a Frenchman.

To section 2 the undersigned can see no objection.

Section 3.—To agree with what has been said above, instead of striking out the words "and an European British subject," there should be added to them "or a Covenanted Civil Servant appointed in England."

Section 4 et seq.—Unimportant.

No. 2078, dated 10th April, 1883.

From—F. D. MACKENZIE, Esq., Acting District Magistrate, Thana,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

As directed in Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant, I have the honour to submit herewith my opinion on the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code sent to me with the Government Resolution quoted above.

2. I venture to say, with all respect, that it is somewhat late in the day to call for the opinions of officials on a Bill which has provoked such a storm of opposition from the European community, and I somewhat shrink from going over the arguments against it. I consider, however, that the main objections to it are that it is entirely unnecessary, that it has been shown to demonstration throughout the country; that the Europeans affected by its provisions look upon it as one as the gravest possible injuries which can be done to their rights and privileges in this country; that if Government look upon this one privilege of Europeans as an anomaly, which for that and no other reason, it is desirable to remove, I can conceive no grounds on which the anomaly, say, of purda nashin women accused of serious offences being allowed to remain unseen by the Court trying them should not also be removed. That is an anomaly based purely on race distinctions, and the particular case I have in mind is one which I myself tried some years ago. The accused was a Native lady accused of very serious offences under the Penal Code, and special arrangements had to be made in my Court to prevent any person, from the trying Magistrate to the witnesses in the case, seeing the accused person!! For all that I could prove to the contrary, I never had the real accused in my Court at all; and such anomalies, which are liable to occur all over the country, are placidly regarded by the Legislature. The continent of India is crammed full of anomalies, and the effect of removing the particular one aimed at by the Bill is to rouse race feelings and jealousies of the very worst character.

3. In the face of the almost unanimous opposition by the European public to the Bill, and considering that this very question must have been discussed when Act X of 1882 was being revised, it seems to me most advisable that this tinkering of a Code which has been barely three months in existence should be dropped. Had there been any real need for such an amendment, it is not unreasonable to suppose that it would have been brought forward prominently when the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 was being discussed; and I cannot imagine that anything has occurred within the short term which has elapsed since its publication to make it necessary for Natives to try Europeans.

No. 2016, dated 20th May, 1882.

From—COLONEL L. D'A. DUNSTERVILLE, District Magistrate, Haidarabad,

To—The Acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

Replying to your No. 2985, Confidential, of 1882, dated the 13th instant, I have the honour to state that, in my opinion, all members of the Covenanted Service, whether European or Native, ought to be placed on the same footing, and that no sufficient reason can be found for maintaining the distinction which now exists between the two classes in regard to their powers of trying Europeans.

No. 1852, dated 3rd May 1883.

From—COLONEL L. D'A. DUNSTERVILLE, District Magistrate, Haidarabad,

To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

Replying to Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd ultimo, I have the honour to state that, after the fullest consideration of the subject of Mr. Ilbert's proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I find myself unable to recommend any fuller concession to the Native magistracy than that advocated in my letter No. 2916 of 20th May 1882, replying to Confidential Circular No. 2985 of 13th idem.

2. I advocated that concession under the impression that all Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service must needs be men thoroughly imbued with European ideas, as men should undoubtedly be who are entrusted with the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects; but I am assured by those who are in a position to know that this is not always the case; that the stay in England of these Native gentlemen is so short, and the trammels of caste and of natural ties are so strong, that no real change of ideas is effected; and that, in the majority of cases, the old legend holds true "Celum, non animus, mutant, qui trans mare currunt."

3. Therefore, if the question put in the Government Resolution No. 2985 of 13th May 1882 were now before me for reply, I should be disposed to advise that no change be made in the existing law in relation to this matter.

4. I freely admit that there must be some Native gentlemen in the magistracy, whether Covenanted or Uncovenanted Civil Servants, who might safely be trusted with the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, but the selection of these would be difficult, and their numbers would be so few that it would hardly be worthwhile to legislate on their behalf.

5. In Sind we have no Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, and in the number of Native Uncovenanted Magistrates whose work has come under my observation during the 32 years that I have served on the Sind Commission, I could not name more than three or four to whom I would have willingly seen such powers entrusted.

6. It is not a question of ability but of impartiality. I have met with many very competent Native Magistrates, and with some very incompetent European Magistrates. There are a thousand and one things among the surroundings of the Native Magistrate which must, in many cases, make it very difficult for him to exhibit strict impartiality, whilst the European Magistrate in India, isolated as he is, has, in the first place, no temptation to be otherwise than impartial, and is, in the second place, fully aware that any exhibition of partiality, even in favour of a European, would infallibly lower him in the estimation of his fellows.

7. In my humble opinion, the time for abolishing all race-distinctions, in the manner proposed by Mr. Ilbert's Bill, will not have arrived until it can be said of the Native magistracy, as a whole, that their decisions are no more swayed by "fear, favour or affection" than are those of the European magistracy.

No. 766, dated 8th May 1883.

From—H. N. B. ERSKINE, Esq., Commissioner in Sind,

To—The Right Honourable the Governor and President in Council, Bombay.

I have the honour to reply to Resolution No. 2258 in the Judicial Department, dated 2nd ultimo, calling for my opinion on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. The Statement of Objects and Reasons shows that the Bill has been prepared because "it was thought anomalous that, while Natives of India were admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service, and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace, and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the presidency-towns." Whether the long-established custom that the British in India should be tried only by Judges or Magistrates who are themselves European British subjects is rightly described as an anomaly is of little consequence; but, if it be admitted that it is so, then the long-continued existence of such an anomaly surely indicates that its existence has not been permitted without good reason.

3. When writing in June last regarding the changes proposed, I expressed an opinion that these were not needed, and the discussions that have since that time taken place have only strengthened and confirmed this opinion. Whatever may have been thought when the Bill was first introduced, there can be no question now that the changes it is sought to introduce would be highly unpopular to the European community. The feeling of dislike to being tried by a Native Magistrate may, in a certain sense, be unwarranted, but it is, to me at all events, a perfectly intelligible one, and I cannot therefore blame those who hold it.

4. The European British subject has hitherto enjoyed certain rights, and these he is unwilling to lose. Any member of the Covenanted Civil Service who had become a Judge or a District Magistrate must, it may be presumed, be qualified to try a European British subject so far as mere legal knowledge and requirements go; but this would not, in my opinion, be reason sufficient for depriving the European British subject of his long-enjoyed and highly-valued right and privilege. I altogether fail to see that there are any grounds for fearing that the present state of the law is in any way likely to be productive of harm, and, therefore, whether the present law is anomalous or not, I would wish to see it continued.

5. I have never been in a district in which there were not several European Magistrates, and, so far as I am aware, there are none such. For this reason I do not consider that, so far as magisterial cases are concerned, any practical inconvenience is likely to be experienced by the law being maintained in its present form. Some slight inconvenience might be caused were the District Sessions Judge a Native gentleman who could not try a European prisoner, but this slight degree of inconvenience would not, in my opinion, justify the change proposed.

6. I do not consider it necessary to explain in detail why I object to the changes proposed. So much has recently been said and written on the subject that I could state nothing new. I fail altogether to see that the continuance of the present law is continuing an "invidious distinction," for, so far as my experience goes, the distinction occasioned no ill-will, and was thoroughly understood and appreciated by the Native community. It is true that, since the Bill has been publicly discussed, the cry that the distinction is one that is unjust to the Native community has been raised; but this clearly is merely a result of the agitation caused by the proposed Bill, and would never, it may confidently be asserted, have been heard had the Bill not been discussed and, I may add, at times attacked with so much virulence by some of the European community. The agitation in favour of the Bill was in no sense spontaneous.

7. There is one other point to which I may refer as an argument against the Bill, namely, that it would not put an end to all distinctions between trials of European British subjects and Natives, and that anomalies would still remain which could only be removed by the repeal of the whole of Chapter XXXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code—a course that I do not believe even the supporters of the present Bill would venture to recommend. This being so, matters had much better be left as they are.

No. 617, dated 8th May 1883.

From—W. H. CROWE, Esq., Acting Judge, Satara,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reply to Government Resolution No. 2258, dated the 2nd April 1883, Judicial Department, calling for my opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I have the honour to make the following observations.

2. With regard to section 1 of the Bill, I can see no reason why any restrictions should be placed on the powers of the Local Governments, as they at present exist, to appoint any European British subject who is thought fit to be a Justice of the Peace. The narrowing of the class from which they may be appointed in the direction contemplated by the Bill is likely to prove inconvenient.

3. It is stated in the Objects and Reasons for the Bill that it is thought anomalous that, while Natives of India are held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the presidency-towns. Leaving aside the question whether this state of things is anomalous or not, it appears to me that it is not the proper function of the legislature to make laws which shall be ideally symmetrical, but to frame such enactments as shall remedy the grievances and pressing needs of the people. No administrative difficulty has been felt in this Presidency, as far as I am aware, owing to the existing state of the law. The proposed change would confer jurisdiction on, at most, five or six officers; but, even if, looking forward to the future, when the Civil Service will have received large reinforcements of Natives, the investment with the proposed jurisdiction were of more universal application, it must be borne in mind that the criminal class of Europeans in India is not large. The cases that arise in which Europeans are concerned are few and far between, and it is, and will always be, possible, in view of the increased facilities of communication which are daily taking place, to make arrangements for the trial of European offenders without having recourse to a legislative enactment, which is liable to misconstruction and calculated to arouse the worst feelings towards our Native fellow-subjects.

4. No inconvenience to the general public is likely to arise from the present state of the law, as, by the provisions of section 445 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is competent to any Magistrate to take cognizance of an offence committed by a European British subject, and, if necessary, issue process for compelling his attendance before a Magistrate having jurisdiction to enquire into and try the case.

5. There is another aspect which presents itself to my mind, which is that, if the idea of removing so-called anomalies from the Statute-book be once dominant, there is no knowing where it will end. It may occur to future legislators to take away the right which Europeans now enjoy, of being tried by a jury of which not less than half the number shall be Europeans or Americans; and gradually the privilege of being tried by his peers, which from the days of the Magna Charta an Englishman has so highly prized, will be altogether taken away to obviate a necessity which in practical politics has never been felt.

6. The Statement of Objects and Reasons goes on further to say that the Government of India has decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race-distinctions. It appears to me that, looking at the history of our connection with India and the constitution of the present system of government of the British Empire in India, any legislation which has for its object the removal of disqualifications based merely on race-distinctions is altogether anomalous. The most cogent illustration of my meaning which occurs to me is suggested by a reference to the constitution of the Native army in India. However efficient as a soldier a Native may be, however qualified in all respects for regimental advancement, it is impossible in the present state of the law that he could be promoted to the command of a regiment.

7. There is yet another objection to the Bill which, from a political point of view, should not be lost sight of, which is, that it is not advisable to create a class of judicial officers which are declared not to possess the confidence of the people over whom they are to exercise jurisdiction.

8. Looking at the amount of race-antagonism which the discussion of this measure has provoked, looking also at the absence of all grounds for its introduction beyond what I may term sentimental ones, I am of opinion that any change in the law in the direction indicated is uncalled for and unnecessary.

No. 2041, dated 16th May, 1882.

From—A. C. JERVOISE, Esq., District Magistrate, Belgaum,

To—The Acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 2985 (Confidential) of the 13th instant, respecting the trial of European British subjects by Native Covenanted Magistrates and Judges.

2. As a general question, I do not see any reason why Native Covenanted Magistrates and Judges should not exercise the same jurisdiction over European British subjects as can be exercised by European Covenanted Magistrates and Judges.

3. Chapter XXXIII of the new Code of Criminal Procedure relates, however, also to jurisdiction in criminal matters over Americans and Europeans other than British subjects.

4. It is to be noted that this chapter is titled "Criminal Proceedings against Europeans and Americans," though sections 443 to 451 refer exclusively to "European British subjects." Section 452 would appear from the wording to apply to all Europeans were it not for the marginal reference, which seems to limit it to European British subjects and Natives jointly accused.

5. Americans and Europeans who are not British subjects do not appear to be made amenable by this chapter to any magisterial jurisdiction. From this it would appear that they are subject to the jurisdiction of both European and Native Magistrates, and are only to be specially treated when brought before the Sessions or the High Courts.

6. The above remarks may not seem to have any reference to your letter under reply; but my object in making them is to represent that, in my opinion, if any change in the law is made, European British subjects, other Europeans and Americans should come under the same jurisdiction.

7. I would point out that, if Covenanted Magistrates are to be given jurisdiction over European British subjects, it will be necessary to amend section 22 of the new Code, as, under it, only European British subjects can be appointed Justices of the Peace outside the Presidency-towns; and I am under the impression that, apart from any provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, European British subjects can only be tried by Magistrates who are Justices of the Peace.

No. 1669, dated 23rd April 1883.

From—A. C. JERVOISE, Esq., District Magistrate, Belgaum.

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to reply to Government Resolution No. 2218 of the 2nd instant.

2. The provisions of the Bill received with the Government Resolution appear to sufficiently meet the object it has in view. I conclude, however, that Government do not wish the replies to their reference to be confined to an opinion as to whether the provisions made in the Bill are likely to be effective or not, but to extend to the question as to whether the passing of such a Bill into law is advisable or otherwise.

3. The nature of the Bill is such that it is not easy for a Government officer to express dissent from its provisions without at the same time discussing the policy out of which it has been born. But I feel that it would be highly unbecoming in me, as an executive officer, to give any sign of questioning that policy.

4. When, in reply to Government circular No. 2985 of the 13th May 1882, I stated that I did not see why Native Magistrates should not have jurisdiction over European British subjects, I regret to say that I did not at the time see all that might be involved in that jurisdiction. As a Magistrate who had spent a considerable number of years in districts where almost the only European British subject besides the Government officers that ever appears is a person whose sole offence is that of being a vagrant, and whom I have never found to offend in any other way, I most inexcusably, I admit, went no deeper into the question than so far as it affected such a class, and I did not see why a Native Magistrate should not be able to dispose of such vagrants as fairly and as intelligently as a European Magistrate; moreover, it appeared to me that, as there would always exist the power of the District Magistrate to transfer, if considered advisable, a case against a European British subject from the Court of a Native to that of a European Magistrate, the exercise of their jurisdiction over Europeans by Native Magistrates would be subject to the immediate control and supervision of the District Magistrate; and, so far as this district—and I might almost venture to add, this Presidency—is concerned, I should still hold to my former opinion, if it were not that I find myself face to face with the possibility—a possibility that even now I can scarcely bring myself to grasp—that it may be at some future time the case that the Magistrate of this district will himself be a Native. When this comes to pass, the guarantee that a European British subject would otherwise feel he had of being tried, if not actually by one of his countrymen, at all events by a Magistrate whose proceedings are subject to the immediate control of a European Magistrate, will be gone.

5. It is not without reason that a European British subject might object to being tried before a Native Magistrate where he cannot obtain (if he could afford it) the assistance of well-trained counsel, either of his own race, or one who may have by practice in cases where Europeans are concerned, acquired a knowledge of European habits, social and domestic unwritten laws, or other subjects which would enable him to clear points which might otherwise be incomprehensible to the Native Magistrate. But, even were his feelings against being tried by a Native Magistrate declared to be simple prejudice, it would have to be admitted it was a prejudice often shared by Natives themselves. I cannot believe that I am alone in my experience of numerous applications made by Natives, when they have been either honestly or dishonestly accused of offences, that their cases may be transferred for trial before a European Magistrate. Such applications are not, as far as I have seen, ever grounded on any supposed superior legal attainments of the European Magistrates, but on some idea that they will obtain a fairer hearing and a judgment which, whether favourable or not, they can rely on as conscientiously arrived at. I have little hesitation in asserting that, if those Natives who have raised their voices against the law, which is (I believe) in force in all colonies, that Europeans shall be tried by their own countrymen, were ever to have practical proof in their own persons that they had thereby debarred themselves from applying that their cases be tried before a European Magistrate, they would much regret the clamour they have made.

6. It may be argued that, if Natives are but little cognizant with those habits of Europeans—social, domestic, commercial or other—a knowledge of which would throw light on a case, there is almost, if not quite an equal, ignorance on the part of Europeans with respect to Natives, and that therefore they are not competent to administer justice to Natives. The answer to this is that it is not ever found that a Native prefers having his case tried by a Native instead of by a European, and that, therefore, however reasonable the sequel may appear, it is fallacious.

7. That there are many good Native Magistrates honest, straight forward and painstaking, I most cordially admit; but I believe these are the very men who not only do not desire to hold jurisdiction over Europeans, but would infinitely rather be without it. I am aware that, as Magistrates, they are not the class or grade to whom the Bill proposes to give such jurisdiction, but as a class of Native gentlemen they are in many cases the same.

8. I have read a great deal of what has been advanced against this Bill in unofficial circles, and have in common with others regretted that indignation and alarm have laid to much being said that was impolitic and unfair, and had therefore a tendency to alienate the sympathies of those who would be desirous of giving the speakers a hearing. Still the Bill is one which, in my humble opinion, should not pass into law without the evident assent of at least a majority of the race or class which alone it affects. No one knows better than do Native Magistrates how plausible are the complaints, how admirably supported by apparently honest evidence, which one Native will bring against any other whom he wishes to place in confinement. I do not wish to go far into the subject, but will only remark that in troublous times, if they should ever arise, few non-official European British subjects would feel that the liberty of themselves and their families would be secure while the highest magisterial authority in the district might be a Native with jurisdiction over them. It is no insult to any Native to suggest that such sense of insecurity would be felt,—it could not with reason be expected to be otherwise,—and the Bill must be looked at with non-official eyes.

9. The Bill is one which does not affect the Native community in the smallest degree. They did not seek it; but those whose vanity was fed with the idea of increased authority over Europeans are now like children who have been offered unexpected sweetmeats and cry that they should be withheld. But the Bill does vitally affect the non-official European colonists up-country and at a distance from reliable legal assistance; and, with all due deference to adverse opinions, I maintain that it is by their voices, and the voices of those whose mercantile and other interests are involved in their comfort and sense of security, that the Bill should be judged.

10. The sole argument which is advanced as the reason for proposing the Bill is that it will remove an anomaly. Because a Native who has succeeded by passing certain examinations in entering the covenanted civil service is held "competent to discharge the highest judicial duties" with respect to his own countrymen, therefore he must be competent to discharge such duties with respect to a race of which he has, at best, but a superficial knowledge. The really important question as to whether the policy of removing the supposed anomaly is safe or sound is not even glanced at.

11. I have said enough to show that I most respectfully, but most emphatically, disapprove of the object of the Bill. But perhaps the best argument against it passing into law is the entire absence of any necessity for it.

No. 329, dated 23rd May, 1883.

From—C. P. COOPER, Esq., Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Resolution of Government, No. 2258 of the 2nd ultimo, forwarding for my opinion a copy of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

2. It appears to me to be but right and fair, and in accordance with the principles of British justice, that an accused person should be tried in open Court, in order that his own community may be cognizant of what is going on, so that if any error or failure of justice should take place in the trial, the voice of public opinion could readily reach those able to redress the wrong.

3. In Presidency-towns, a European is liable to be tried by a Native Magistrate, but such trial always takes place in the midst of a large European community, in the presence of members of the legal profession and of representatives of the Press, and, if any error or failure of justice did take place, it could very speedily be brought to the notice of the authorities, and redress easily obtained.

4. This state of things does not exist in the mofussil; for, except in a very few stations, the European community is very limited, legal assistance cannot be easily obtained, there are no representatives of an English Press, and a European accused would therefore be placed at an extreme disadvantage in the event of his being tried before a Native tribunal.

5. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the time has not yet arrived when Native Magistrates in the mofussil can be invested with the power contemplated in the Bill.

No. 464, dated 13th April, 1883.

From—W. S. FORMAN, Esq., District Judge, Hyderabad,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd instant, I have the honour to make the following observations.

2. In the first paragraph of the Statement of Objects and Reasons accompanying the proposed Bill, it is stated that it was thought anomalous that Natives should be deemed incompetent to exercise jurisdiction over Europeans outside the Presidency-towns. I would observe with all deference that it seems to me that it is hardly worth while legislating merely to remove an anomaly. As long as an arrangement of any sort works well, I am humbly of opinion it is perfectly immaterial whether it is anomalous or not.

3. I do not see that much practical inconvenience has as yet been caused by the law as it stands, and with careful supervision by the executive I do not anticipate any future inconvenience.

4. As a practical instance of what I mean, I may mention the possible case of a Native gentleman in Sind being appointed to the Native civil service. It would be very easy for Government so to employ this gentleman as not to put him in a position when he would be likely to have to try Europeans.

5. I have had considerable experience as a Magistrate and Sessions Judge in this Province, and have known several Native gentlemen who have been, and now are, employed as first class and sub-divisional Magistrates. I have heard of no inconvenience caused by these gentlemen not having power to try Europeans.

6. It seems to me that as long as any part of Chapter XXXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code remains unrepealed, every judicial disqualification based merely on race-distinctions will not be at once and completely removed from the Code.

7. Personally, had I occasion to be tried by a Magistrate, I should care little, if at all, whether he were a European or an Asiatic, but the great majority of Europeans in India would, as they have shown, care very much; and I venture to question the expediency of removing an anomaly at the cost of exciting strong discontent among the non-official European community.

8. In conclusion, I would deferentially observe that, if anomalies are to be removed because they are anomalous, it becomes somewhat hard to justify the retention by Great Britain of her present position in India.

No. 3400, dated 18th May, 1883.

From—J. G. MOORE, Esq., District Magistrate, Puna,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In compliance with the request contained in paragraph 1 of Government Resolution in the Judicial Department, No. 2258, dated the 2nd ultimo, I have the honour to express my opinion on the subject of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. So much has been written and said about this Bill that, in expressing my dissent from its principles, I can add nothing new.

3. It is argued in favour of the Bill that an invidious distinction is at present drawn between European and Native members of the Civil Service, inasmuch as the latter are apparently deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects, and that this anomaly should be removed.

4. In my opinion, it is not a question of competency or incompetency on the part of Native members of the civil service. As far as those belonging to the covenanted civil service are concerned, I admit that, by education, they are competent. It is not in respect to the trying authority, but in respect to the persons liable to be tried, that I object to the provisions of the Bill.

5. The question, as I view it, is, are Her Majesty's Native subjects to be allowed certain privileges and concessions, while none are to be allowed to Her European subjects in India?

6. If all anomalies were abolished in this country, if all race-distinctions and caste-prejudices were removed, the case would be different; but when respect is paid by our Law Courts to the customs and caste-prejudices of Natives of India, Europeans in India may fairly claim equal consideration.

7. It is the desire of Her Majesty's Government that all accused persons, whether Natives or Europeans, should be placed on an equal footing when arraigned before a Court of Justice; but, if this Bill becomes law, this desire will not be fulfilled.

8. In a Presidency-town, it does not signify if a European be tried by a Native Justice of the Peace; he has numbers of his fellow-countrymen about him; he can, if he pleases, engage European counsel or a counsel who thoroughly understands English, and he feels that he will have a fair trial. But in some out-of-the-way corner of the Mufassal, without any knowledge, or perhaps a very imperfect knowledge, of the language of the district, without a fellow-countryman anywhere near, I hold that an accused European is placed at a very great disadvantage compared with a Native of India under similar circumstances.

9. If the passing of this Bill into law was called for in the interests of the country and of the people at large, it would of course be right to disregard the feelings of a particular section of the community; but there is no such justification for the measure, and, as the Bill has caused, and will not cease to cause, the greatest dissatisfaction to the most loyal subjects of Her Majesty in this country, I think that it should be withdrawn.

10. If a compromise is considered desirable, then let Native members of the covenanted civil service be made Justices of the Peace, and let Her Majesty's European British subjects have, as now, the option of being tried by European Judges and Magistrates.

No. 882, dated 2nd May, 1883.

From—E. T. CANDY, Esq., Acting District Judge, Tháná,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to reply to Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, on the subject of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. The Statement of Objects and Reasons says:—"It was thought anomalous that, while Natives of India were admitted to the covenanted civil service and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the Presidency-towns."

I completely concur in that opinion. So long as the two conditions abovementioned are fulfilled, I cannot see how a Native judicial officer should be deemed incompetent to try European British subjects.

3. But those conditions are of the highest importance.

(a) The Native of India must be a member of the covenanted civil service.

(b) He must have risen to the highest judicial posts, that is, District Magistrate or Sessions Judge.

The first condition ensures his general fitness, the second his judicial fitness. Both are the complement one of the other.

A Native civilian may have shown signs of the highest judicial acumen, and yet be unfit from general training to try European British subjects; or he may, by residence in England or long mixing with Europeans, have acquired that intimate acquaintance with English thought and habit which is necessary to one trying European British subjects, but he may not have the judicial training and ability which are also necessary.

4. I therefore approve of section 2 of the Bill, which makes all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ex-officio Justices of the Peace; because these officers, when Natives of India, have shown their general fitness for that post by winning their admission to the covenanted civil service, and their judicial fitness by work and training, which have justified Government in making them Sessions Judges and District Magistrates.

5. But it may be said:—Under the rules made under the Statute 33 Victoria, chapter 3, Natives are now admitted to the civil service without undergoing the training and competition through which the ordinary members of the covenanted civil service have to pass. These Natives must in course of time become District Magistrates or Sessions Judges and ex-officio Justices of the Peace, and yet the first condition abovementioned is not fulfilled, for they have not shown their general fitness by winning their admission to the covenanted civil service. I admit the flaw, and I would therefore restrict section 2 of the Bill to those Sessions Judges and District Magistrates who are members of the covenanted civil service.

6. I know that it has been declared unwise or impracticable to make any distinction between Native members of the covenanted civil service and members of the Native civil service under the statutory rules. I would respectfully protest against this view. There is the widest possible difference between the two classes. It is no insult to Mr. A or Mr. B, who have lately been admitted to the civil service under the statutory rules, to say that there is no comparison between them and, say, Mr. Tagore. When Natives complained of the exceptional difficulty they felt in sending their sons home to compete for the covenanted civil service, the reply in my opinion seemed clear:—

It is only natural and proper that there should be exceptional difficulty, for a Native who wins a position in the covenanted civil service will hold an exceptional position; he will take part in the government of the country, having great power over the members of the dominant race. There is no indignity in this expression, for, as long as England is the paramount power in India, so long an Englishman must be a member of the dominant race.

7. It would be impertinent on my part to pursue this subject further, though I would fain show that the natural and inevitable result of admitting Natives to the civil service by the back-door of statutory rules, and then allowing them to rise to the highest executive and judicial posts, must be that in the end we (Englishmen) withdraw from all share in the government of the country. That may not happen for a long time, and it may be quite right and proper that it should eventually happen; but the point which strikes me forcibly is that we should honestly look at the future and admit that this will be (as far as we can see) the natural result of our policy, and that it is what we intend.

8. The admission of Natives to the civil service by the statutory rules, not being now under discussion, must be accepted as a fact which cannot be altered; but we must also accept the fact that there is a vast difference in the training of these gentlemen and in that of those who have won their admission to the covenanted civil service by competition, and that difference must be an important factor in considering their fitness to have criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects.

9. If it be ruled that, for sundry reasons, it is advisable to ignore this difference, and that the training and general acquaintance with English thought and habit which Native civilians under the statutory rules will obtain after their admission to the civil service may be taken as an equivalent of those advantages which a Native covenanted civilian has acquired when he enters the service (a proposition the truth of which I doubt), then section 2 of the Bill can stand as it is, and all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates (whatever their previous training) will be ex-officio Justices of the Peace.

10. But the Bill goes much further. It gives Government the power to appoint to that office any Native first class Magistrate who is a member of the covenanted civil service or of the Native civil service under the statutory rules, or who is an Assistant Commissioner in Non-Regulation Provinces. (I omit Cantonment Magistrates, as that class (d) is admittedly not meant to apply to Natives.)

Now, I presume that it will be admitted that some exceptional safeguards are necessary for the trial of European British subjects. Otherwise, why is there any distinction drawn at all in the Code? Why should a Sessions Judge be able to sentence a Native to death, while he cannot sentence a European British subject to more than one year's imprisonment. So it is only a question of degree. Where shall we draw the line? Shall we say that, when a Native civilian has reached the post of Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, he shall be ex-officio fit to exercise this exceptional jurisdiction (a line that is intelligible and easily defined), or shall we say that, after he has passed his departmental examinations and become a first class Magistrate, then, if the Government thinks him fit, he shall be invested with the exceptional jurisdiction?

11. I respectfully submit that this latter proposal amounts to an unsatisfactory, undefined line. How does Government propose to judge of the fitness in each case? By reports from the High Court as to the "cases" sent up by such and such an officer? I submit that, until the officer has exercised jurisdiction over European British subjects, it would be impossible for the High Court to judge of his capability in that direction. By confidential reports from the District Magistrate? This would be better; but still I submit it would cause grave anomalies. In district A the Magistrate might think that every Native first class Magistrate is fit to exercise such powers: in district B the Magistrate might think that in no case should a Native Magistrate have such jurisdiction. And how invidious would be the distinction.

In district A there might be a Native first class Magistrate of five years' standing exercising the powers, while in district B there might be a Native first class Magistrate of seven years' standing not exercising the powers. 'Why (the latter would say) am I debarred from exercising the full powers which my junior enjoys? Have I shown myself to be too independent, and is it feared that, if an European British subject comes before me for trial, I shall be unduly severe? Must I truckle to my superiors to attain to the full dignity of my office?' I feel sure that it would be soon found impracticable to draw the line according to the idea of Government as to each man's fitness, and the result would be to lay down a rule that every Native first class Magistrate directly he obtains his first class powers or after exercising his powers for six months or one or two years (whatever may be the limit fixed), should have the usual magisterial jurisdiction over European British subjects.

12. But the Bill says that only first class Magistrates, who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service or of the Native Civil Service under the statutory rules or are Assistant Commissioners, shall, when considered fit, exercise these powers. It omits all other Native first class Magistrates; and yet the Statement of Objects and Reasons says that the time has come to remove at once and completely every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions.

On what ground, then, are the numerous Native Mámlatdárs and Deputy Collectors who are first class Magistrates disqualified from exercising jurisdiction over European British subjects? They have passed the departmental examinations. The only difference between them and the Native Civilians under the statutory rules is that the former have won their position by good service and ability, while the latter have been selected under certain rules—rules which admittedly do not in the slightest degree touch the question of fitness to try Europeans.

13. The case of a district may be easily supposed where the District Deputy Collector has full executive and magisterial charge of talukas A and B, but cannot try Europeans, while a "statutory rule" civilian has charge of talukas C and D, and can try Europeans. Some of these Deputy Collectors and Mámlatdárs with first class powers are able men; and, if the Bill is passed as it stands, it will soon have to be amended in order to correct the "anomaly" pointed out above. Therefore, I submit that the Bill does not remove at once and completely every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions. And I also submit that for that to be done completely, that is, both subjectively and objectively, the term "European British subject" must be expunged from our Criminal Procedure Code. Is Government prepared to go that length? If so, let us honestly say that the present amendment of the law is only an instalment of the final corrections of all anomalies, to which we look forward in the future.

14. I know that a great deal of "sentiment" has been expressed on both sides of the controversy which has arisen regarding the Bill. But I do not think that on this side of India we can share the fears that our wives and daughters will run the risk of unjust convictions by Native Magistrates, or even of unjust prosecutions on the part of vindictive darzís or butlers; what I do fear is that Native Magistrates in the mufassal will not have the moral courage to convict an influential Englishman when his punishment is justly due. And therefore I recommend that the new jurisdiction should be confined to officers who have attained an assured position, that is, District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, and officers who hold a corresponding rank in Non-Regulation Provinces (Deputy Commissioners, &c.).

15 To sum up, my opinion is briefly:—

- (a) If the Bill is not to be a final and complete correction of race anomalies in our criminal procedure, let this be clearly understood.
- (b) If the trial of Europeans is to be hedged in with exceptional safeguards, then let the law stand as it is now (that is, that an European should be tried by an European for petty offences and by the High Court in important cases), with this important amendment, which I believe is amply sufficient for administrative purposes, that is, when a Native Covenanted Civilian attains the rank of Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, let him be considered fit to exercise the same jurisdiction as his European colleagues.
- (c) If for administrative purposes it be thought necessary to go further, then let the statutory Civilian be put in the same rank with the Native Covenanted Civilian.
- (d) If it be thought necessary to go still further, then let all Native first class Magistrates have jurisdiction over Europeans, but let there not be any ill-defined line, which leaves everything to the opinion of Government as to the personal fitness of each individual officer, and must perforce shut out many Native Magistrates who are as fit as those to whom the jurisdiction will be given.

No. 405, dated 1st May, 1883.

From—E. CORDEAUX, Esq., Sessions Judge, Pána,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In compliance with Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, I have the honour to submit the following observations on the draft Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. I would, in the first place, point out certain flaws in the draft, which appear to me to be due to oversight, and to point to undue haste in preparing the Bill, which is all the more to be regretted considering the amount of opposition and strong criticism the Bill has been subject to since its publication.

3. To begin with, the effect of the proposed amendment contained in section 1 of the Bill will be to exclude all members of the naval, military and uncovenanted services and all non-official persons from eligibility to be appointed Justices of the Peace. Such a result of the proposed legislation as this could scarcely have been seriously contemplated.

4. Again, why are Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces and Cantonment Magistrates specially introduced in this proposed amendment of section 22 of the Code? As European British subjects, they are already eligible, and as Natives, in the first place, there is, I imagine, nothing to prevent a Native from rising to the appointment of Commissioner or Deputy Commissioner in a Non-Regulation Province; so that, under the proposed law, a Native Assistant Commissioner would become eligible to be appointed a Justice of the Peace; while the Commissioner or Deputy Commissioner would, if a Native, be ineligible; and, in the second place, a Cantonment Magistrate is, as a fact, always a European British subject.

5. In the next place, while provision has been made in the Bill to meet the case of Sessions Judges and District Magistrates, there is no reference to Additional or Joint Sessions Judges.

6. With regard to the merits of the Bill, I would submit that as the opportunity of introducing the proposed amendments was not taken when the present Code was before the Legislative Council of the Governor General, the removal or modification of the anomaly which the Bill is intended to do away with might very well have been left until some future re-settlement of the law.

7. At the same time, I can see no objection to the proposed amendment of section 25 of the Code; for I think, if any Native member, whether of the Covenanted or the Native Civil Service, is fit to be a Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, he should by virtue of his office be a Justice of the Peace. It is essential that the chief district tribunals to the jurisdiction of which European British subjects are amenable should not be reduced in number, and, therefore, the two principal tribunals in each district should always possess such jurisdiction, whether presided over by Europeans or Natives.

8. A change in the law in this respect is inevitable, and, as the Bill is now before the public, it may be as well to carry it through to this extent. A similar provision in favour of Commissioners, Deputy or Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces, with a view of preserving a sufficient number of tribunals exercising the necessary jurisdiction, might be introduced in the Bill.

9. Beyond this, I cannot see what occasion there is for any alteration in the existing law. I would, therefore, leave section 22 of the Code as it at present stands, without any amendment, the amendment of section 25 being sufficient for all practical purposes.

10. Section 443 of the Code should be amended by adding the words "or District Magistrate." The amendment of section 444 of the Code as proposed in the Bill is, of course, consistent with the proposed amendment of section 25.

No. 218, dated 4th May, 1883.

From—J. G. WHITE, Esq., District Magistrate, Surat,

To—The Commissioner of Northern Division, Bombay.

Referring to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd ultimo, I have the honour to state that, in my opinion, the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1832, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, should be so framed as to provide—

- (a) for the investment with powers over European subjects of all Native members of the civil service who may have attained to the position of a District Magistrate or of a Judge and Sessions Judge, or who may be acting in those appointments;
- (b) for conferring similar powers on any Native civilian, being a Magistrate of the first class, who may have exercised judicial functions for not less than five years, and of whose fitness for the exercise of jurisdiction over Europeans the Government may entertain no doubt.

No. 2217, dated 15th May, 1883.

From—R. E. CANDY Esq., District Magistrate, Kanara,

To—The Commissioner of Southern Division, Bombay.

In reply to your No. 479P. of 18th April 1883, I have the honour to submit copy of a report by Mr. Todd on the Jurisdiction Bill, and to give my opinion as follows:—

Every officer who rises to the important post of District Judge or District Magistrate must ex-officio have jurisdiction over Europeans, whether he be a European or a Native.

No Native should be promoted to either of these posts unless Government have good reason to believe he will exercise such jurisdiction with perfect impartiality.

I respectfully beg to submit that in no other case does the law call for any change, and, except in the case of District Magistrates or District Judges, no Native Magistrates outside the Presidency-towns should be invested with jurisdiction over European British subjects.

No. 452, dated 7th May, 1883.

From—J. H. TODD, Esq., Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Sirsi,
To—The District Magistrate of Kanara.

With reference to your endorsement No. 1641 of 11th ultimo, I have the honour to inform you that I consider section 2 of the Jurisdiction Bill, which makes all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates ex-officio Justices of the Peace, and, therefore, will confer jurisdiction over Europeans on Native Civilians who attain those positions, is quite unobjectionable.

2. In the Bombay Presidency, the positions of Sessions Judge and District Magistrate are attained to only after several years' service, and it appears to me quite unreasonable to suppose that an officer who is fit to perform the duties of the judicial and magisterial head of a district is not fit to be entrusted with the very limited jurisdiction over European offenders given to the Mufassal Courts by the Criminal Procedure Code. Europeans in the Mufassal are at present subject to the control of Native police-officers, and I should think that they would on this account be more liable to insult and annoyance than were they rendered liable to be tried by Native officers in the position of a Sessions Judge or District Magistrate.

3. With regard to the 1st section of the Bill, I think that Native officers under clauses (a) and (b) should not be eligible to be made Justices of the Peace till they had served some time in a magisterial capacity. I would make this term ten years. This would cause no inconvenience, as in every district there is nearly sure to be one or more Civilians of over ten years' service; and after ten years' service Government would be able very accurately to judge whether any Native Civilian would be likely to abuse his powers were he given jurisdiction over Europeans. With regard to the officers mentioned in clause (c), as I have no knowledge of from what manner of persons the post of Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces (when not Covenanted Civilians) are appointed, I cannot give an opinion as to their fitness to be given jurisdiction over Europeans. With regard to Cantonment Magistrates, I consider that, looking to the particular nature of their duties, military men should, as a rule, hold such appointments, and there can hardly be ever any serious difficulty in finding qualified military officers to fill such posts.

4. For the reason stated in paragraph 4 of this letter and because Assistant Sessions Judges would not always after three years' service as such have attained to ten years' service, I should alter the proviso to one that he should be of at least ten years' service.

No. 1368, dated 7th June, 1883.

From—M. H. SCOTT, Esq., Sessions Judge, Ahmadnagar,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In accordance with Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April last, I have the honour to submit the following remarks on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

2. I am unable to understand why there should be any restriction with regard to the persons who may be appointed Justices of the Peace. By the proposed alteration, many persons otherwise admirably qualified will be ineligible for the office of Justice of the Peace; for instance, a Covenanted Civilian, who is a Justice of the Peace up to the date of his retiring from the service, would be ineligible the day following his retirement; and there are several officers who might usefully be invested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace who, not coming within the classes mentioned in section 22 as amended, or not being first class Magistrates, could not be appointed as Justices of the Peace.

3. It may be worth consideration whether Justices of the Peace might not be abolished in India. Such powers as are necessary could be conferred under the Code of Criminal Procedure. If it be deemed necessary to retain the office of Justice of the Peace in regard to matters other than criminal jurisdiction in such cases as is necessary, persons might be invested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace for such purposes as might be requisite only.

4. I adhere to my former opinion that Sessions Judges and District Magistrates or officers occupying positions with similar powers (Assistant Judges, F. P., for instance) may, if Natives, be vested with the same powers as regards European British subjects as European members of the Covenanted Civil Service holding similar appointments. But I do not think any further alteration in the present law as regards jurisdiction over European British subjects seems necessary. If an alteration be desirable, a beginning might be made by allowing an European British subject to accept, if he desired, the jurisdiction of a Court presided over by a Native officer, who would then have full power to try him as if he were himself an European British subject.

5. It might also be well if benches of Magistrates or Justices were formed, composed of both European British subjects and Natives, who might begin by trying petty cases and eventually be invested with such powers as might be convenient. Or Native Assistant Judges at head-quarters might be empowered to try European British subjects in such cases as were referred to them by the Sessions Judge. In such cases, the accused might, on good ground being shown, object to the order transferring his case for trial, and would be able to apply to the Sessions Judge, during the trial, if necessary, with an appeal against conviction if found guilty.

6. I believe the appointment of Natives as Assistant Judges would be in every way satisfactory. They might be selected from the Subordinate Judges, and would supply a cheap and effective means of relieving the District and Sessions Courts. It would, of course, still be necessary that members of the Covenanted Service should be appointed as Assistant Judges to acquire the necessary training, but there are several districts which are at present without any Assistant Judge, and the experiment might be tried in these, at first, of appointing Native Assistants.

7. With regard to the principle of empowering Natives to try European British subjects, the fitness of the trying officers is not so much a consideration as whether it is necessary to deprive European British subjects of the privileges they now enjoy.

8. But, further, the position, feelings and ideas of the European British subjects most likely to be affected by the proposed changes should be carefully considered. The greater number of these persons belong to classes which always consider a Native, no matter how high his rank, as an inferior. Resistance to the jurisdiction of a Court, and possibly terrorism of the presiding officer, though eventually severely punished, may do much to bring the Court or the officer into contempt, or impair their usefulness, and may injure the officer concerned by destroying his firmness and confidence.

9. For, to be of any use, the Native officers empowered to try European British subjects will have to be stationed, as a rule, at a distance from any superior authority from whom they might obtain countenance or assistance.

10. There is perhaps not much fear that false complaints by Natives against European British subjects would increase if the Court ordinarily used were presided over by a Native in the usual course of things, but it is possible that, in some of the remoter districts, European British subjects, if rivals in business, might endeavour to injure one another at a busy season by false complaints, presumably made by subordinates against their employers, and these complaints might be met by the accused and his employer's terrifying the trying authorities. But such matters may be left to settle themselves. It will always be open to Government to appoint a European Magistrate where one seems to be required, or to substitute Native for European agency where advisable.

11. It is obvious that, if the number of European British subjects in India increases, as it has a tendency to do, and if the number of officers who can try European British subjects decreases or remains stationary, there must come a time when more or less jurisdiction over European British subjects must be conferred upon Native officers. It is also probable that, if such jurisdiction were conferred, a European British subject would prefer the nearer to the more remote tribunal in the majority of cases. The cases in which a Native Magistrate could try a European British subject would not be numerous, and would usually be trifling in nature; and a busy man would no doubt prefer to pocket his pride and be tried by a Native Magistrate rather than lose time and money by travelling to and from the Court of the European Magistrate.

12. The term "European British subjects" is, as has been pointed out during the debates on the Bill in the Viceregal Council, "a mere legal creation of the Indian Criminal Procedure Code." The applicability of the term since it was first used has been already more than once changed, and it may be changed again. The present definition is anomalous, because the great-grand-children of one brother may be European British subjects and those of another may not, though both brothers may have the same father and mother. And the child of a Native father and mother, if born in England, is an European British subject. It may be that some so-called European British subjects now in office may be, under the Code of Criminal Procedure, really Natives. "Colour has nothing to do with it, as Mr. Gibbs has observed; "a perfectly white person may not come within the definition, while a decidedly dark one may." And it must be in many cases an exceedingly difficult matter for an accused person to prove that he is an European British subject; and if an European British subject is always to insist on trial by an European British subject, he will either have to always carry his credentials with him, or possibly remain in custody or untried till he can procure them.

13. But, though it is easy to point out anomalies and suggest advantages, I think it is a question whether the time has come for so sweeping an alteration as that proposed. It is quite probable that the opposition which the Bill has provoked is in character much the same as that roused by the proposal to open museums, &c., on Sunday in England. The working classes consider that the day of rest itself would by the measure be endangered, and possibly finally lost to them, and they are extremely jealous and apprehensive on the point. Similarly, Europeans in India cannot believe that, if the proposed Bill becomes law, the privileges left to them may not be swept away. Whether they would be any the worse off if their privileges were so removed may be a question, but I certainly think the changes, if made, should be gradual.

No. 698, dated 10th April, 1883.

From—A. C. WATT, Esq., District Judge, Dharwar,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reply to Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April, 1883, forwarding a copy of a Bill, and the Statement of Objects and Reasons therefor, to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, I have the honour to inform you that, on again reading carefully my confidential letter No. 722 of 20th May, 1882, I see no reason, notwithstanding all the agitation which has taken place, to alter the opinion I then gave. My opinion, of course, only extends to the Bombay Presidency, as I have never served elsewhere.

2. I repeat that I think there ought not to be a distinction between European covenanted civil servants and the two Native covenanted civil servants in this Presidency who have entered the service by competition. But as regards those members of the covenanted civil service who have been more recently put in by selection or patronage, I do not think that, at all events for some years to come, it would be advisable to confer on them any jurisdiction in criminal cases over European British subjects.

No. 731 P. Confidential, dated 22nd May, 1882.

From—A. CRAWFORD, Esq., Commissioner, Southern Division, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

In reply to your letter No. 2985, Confidential, of 13th instant, I beg to state that, in my opinion, it is very desirable to place all the members of the covenanted service, whether European or Native, selected by competition on the same footing with regard to criminal proceedings against European British subjects. As regards those appointed by nomination (Native civil service), it will not be invidious, at least for some time to come, to lay down that they shall not try European British subjects unless they have exercised magisterial powers for three years. A similar restriction has been placed on all Assistant Sessions Judges (vide section 444 of the new Criminal Procedure Code).

No. 234 S. P., dated 6th May, 1883.

From—A. CRAWFORD, Esq., Commissioner, Southern Division, Bombay,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to state, with reference to the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, that I adhere to the opinion expressed by me on 22nd May last, No. P. 731 Confidential.

No. 506, dated 23rd April, 1883.

From—LIEUT.-COLONEL G. C. GRANT, Sessions Judge, Karachi,
To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution, Judicial Department, No. 2258 of 2nd April, 1883, forwarding for opinion copy of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I have the honour to submit my views briefly as follows:—

2. I wholly disapprove of the provisions of the Bill. The arguments against the proposed modification of the existing law have been so ably stated by the opponents of the Bill, and notably by Sir James Stephen, that it is needless for me to recapitulate them.

3. I imagine that one of the objects of the Government of India in consulting local officers is to ascertain whether, in the part of India with which they are connected, any administrative inconvenience exists in consequence of Native Magistrates not exercising jurisdiction over European British subjects, such as is alleged by the supporters of the measure. I have been in civil employ in Sind for 23 years and have been a Judge in the province for 20 years, and have never heard of any such administrative difficulties whatever. I feel confident that none exist.

4. If the Government of India, notwithstanding the overwhelming consensus of non-official European opinion against the Bill, are determined to proceed with it, I am of opinion that the proposed jurisdiction should be given only to Natives of the covenanted civil service who have attained the position of Sessions Judge or District Magistrate. In conclusion, I may state that I consider the proposed legislation most ill-timed and wholly unnecessary.

No. 921, dated 10th May, 1883.

From—W. H. PROPERT, Esq., Acting Commissioner, Northern Division, Bombay,
To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour, as directed in Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April, 1883, Judicial Department, to submit the reports of the District Magistrates in this division upon the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. The District Magistrates of Kaira and Kolába have forwarded, in original, separate reports by their assistants and deputies, and these also will be found amongst the papers herewith sent.

2. As regards my own opinion, I have but little to add to the views I expressed, as Collector and Magistrate of Khandesh, when the question was mooted last year.

3. I then stated that a few years hence some or all of the changes now proposed by Mr. Ilbert will probably have to be made, but that, in my opinion, their introduction should be delayed as long as possible. I further stated that as a rule, Native Magistrates in the Mufassal would rather not have the power to try Europeans, and this opinion I still hold.

4. I should now be glad to see Mr. Ilbert's Bill placed on one side and its further consideration deferred for an unlimited period, as I certainly think that the objections raised to its proposed provisions on the part of the European population of this country are based on solid grounds, and are therefore worthy of consideration and respect.

5. It would, of course, be unbecoming for me or any other officer to hazard an opinion as to whether the Government of India can, just at this moment, shelve the Bill without loss of dignity. If, however, it be decided to proceed with the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, I would earnestly recommend that the appointment of Justice of the Peace in the Mufassal be conferred only upon members of the Covenanted Civil Service, that is, those who gained their position by competition in England.

6. It would be easy for every one of us to argue at great length in support of our own particular view of the question, but, as the matter has already been publicly and officially considered from every possible point of view, it is undesirable for individual officers to say more than is absolutely necessary. It may be taken as proved, however, that the general

* E. g., vide the opinion of the Magistrate, First Class, Mr. Bahmanje Modi, of Kaira, herewith sent.      opinion of Europeans of every class, and of a few Natives* also, is opposed to a change in the law.

No. 744, dated 23rd May, 1882.

From—G. M. MACPHERSON, Esq., District Judge, Surat,

To—The Chief Secretary to Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to forward the report called for in Mr. Peile's letter No. 2985, Confidential, of 13th instant.

2. In my opinion, all members of the Covenanted Civil Service, whether European or Native, who have been selected in the ordinary way, but excluding those appointed in India, should be placed on the same footing as regards trying European British subjects. They have entered the service in the same way, they have had a good education to commence with, have passed the same examinations and have gone through the same training, while those of them who are Natives of India have acquired some knowledge of the ways of Europeans in their own country.

3. The great difficulty in making any changes in such matters is to know where to draw the line and where to stop. Theoretically, all men may have a right to be treated in the same way before Courts of law, before which all are equal. The obligation to obey the law and the liability to be punished for breaking it is the same in the case of all subjects, European or otherwise. A Court entrusted with power to decide whether one man has committed an offence within its cognizance should presumably be able to decide whether any other person has committed that offence. Prima facie no man should be allowed to say to a Court of his land "You are fit to try A. B. for theft, but you are not fit to try me for the same offence." And it might be argued that the law should not speak virtually to that effect, by making personal distinctions as to certain classes, who are not to be tried or are to be tried by particular Courts. And the anomaly seems still greater when the restriction seems in favour of one special class, and is based simply on the nationality of the person tried or of the Judge who tries him. To the philosopher this may seem very unjust.

4. But other considerations come into play, and practically force us to this anomaly, which at first seem so unjust. I shall restrict myself simply to those which seem to me to bear on the restrictions above suggested by me. The very circumstances of the country make it inadvisable in the interests of justice that power to try European British subjects should be given to all Courts. To say "You shall try some European British subjects, but not all" would be still more unjust than to say "You shall try no European British subjects," for it would introduce both a personal and a class distinction. In the Presidency-towns, where there are numerous Europeans of all classes, the Presidency Magistrates try all irrespective of race. In large military stations, where there are European regiments, there are Cantonment Magistrates. In most other parts of the Presidency, except in one or two places where there are many railway employes, the Europeans chiefly met with are men of education and good social position; in many parts they are almost all officials. They are people who may be said never to commit the petty offences for which people are usually tried by the lower grades of Magistrates. Suppose a charge brought against one of them, whom one of these Magistrates acquitted; all the disaffected people in the neighbourhood would at once exclaim that the Magistrate was afraid to convict one who was probably a friend of the Magistrate's superior officer. However proper the acquittal might be, it would, as a matter of course, by many be put down to improper reasons. Now, when we see how often Native newspapers believe every European, especially every European official, to be guilty of every charge brought against him even by anonymous correspondents, it may be imagined what would be the outcry against Europeans who were acquitted by the lower grades of the magistracy. From my own perusal of newspapers it seems to me that some papers believe every European official must be guilty of every offence suggested against him, and every acquittal of a European is considered a failure of justice. Much more would this be the case were Magistrates generally vested with the power to try Europeans.

5. Assuming, then, that for their own sake, and for the sake of justice, all Magistrates cannot be vested with this power, the question comes to be "Who should be so? Where should the line be drawn?" To select some Magistrates and leave out others of the same grade would lead to all sorts of personal reflections, while some who might pass very high examinations would be very unfit to be entrusted with the power. Again, the fact comes into play that the customs of the two races vary very much. It is often a complaint against Europeans that they know very little of the real habits and thoughts of the people of this country. But equally true it is that very few of the Natives of this country know much of our ways. Even of those who come into contact a good deal with Europeans, few understand our social habits, our freedom of intercourse, our domestic matters or those motives which go so far in forming the rule of life. Here, I think, we have a definite point where the line may be drawn.

6. A Civilian who has passed the examinations at home must of necessity have learned much more of European life and customs than one who has not been in Europe, but who, without leaving his own country, has been nominated to an appointment in the service. Living as one in a crowd, he must see more of European life, both good and evil, passing before him than he would do in this country. Wherein our habits differ from those of this country, wherein the motives and principles which mould our lives differ from those of his own countrymen, how the freedom of our domestic and social intercourse varies from what he has been accustomed to, are matters which he will see as a young man in England in a way that he can never do by mere intercourse with Europeans in this country.

7. Since I first thought of the subject when the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872 was under discussion, I have never seen why there should be any distinction of this nature between members of the Civil Service, occupying similar official positions, or why one Sessions Judge or Magistrate (of the Covenanted Civil Service) should have more or less power than another filling a corresponding office. But the "Native Civil Servants" appointed in India have had neither the same training nor the same advantages of residence in Europe as their countrymen who passed into the service by competition, and this seems to me to give a distinct place where to halt.

8. If the latter (the Native Civil Servants appointed in India) receive the power under discussion, apart from inherent disadvantages which I trust I have shown to exist, there will be the great disadvantage that there will be continual pressure to advance still further. It would be asked why a Magistrate who has passed his examinations creditably and done good service should be prevented from exercising the full magisterial powers vested in a man, his equal, who owing to patronage or interest had acquired one of a few appointments limited in number and therefore open to very few.

9. We live in an age when everything conceded leads to a demand for still more. In this matter, a very plausible cry might be raised for equality in the powers of Magistrates and Judges without invidious questions of birth and race. An outcry in this country as to this will meet a response from, and be re-echoed by, many in England, who know very little about India, but will shout for equal justice and equal privileges for all without regard to nationality. If people who receive their appointments owing to patronage are vested with the power in question, it will be asked why their countrymen for whom such appointments from their fewness could not possibly be found, but who have obtained equal magisterial rank and passed examinations in law, should not have the same power. It would be to little effect simply to say "Because one set was appointed to the Covenanted Civil Service and the others were not." It seems to me that a far more satisfactory answer would be "All who enter the service in the regular way have the full powers of the offices to which they are appointed."

No. 829, dated 10th May, 1883.

From—G. M. MACPHERSON, Esq., District Judge, Surat,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to forward the report called for in Government Resolutions No. 2258 of 2nd April and No. 2746 of 23rd April 1883.

2. In my confidential No. 744 of 23rd May 1882, I replied to a letter so far on the same subject, and in it I stated that "in my opinion all members of the Covenanted Civil Service, whether European or Native, who have been selected in the ordinary way, but excluding those appointed in India, should be placed on the same footing as regards trying European British subjects." The reference then made in your No. 2985 (confidential) of 13th May 1882, was simply as to members of the Covenanted Service, whether European or Native. The Bill, however, now under report goes beyond that proposal, and includes "Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces or Cantonment Magistrates," as well as Civilians entering the service by competition and members of the Native Civil Service constituted under the Statute 33 Vic., chapter 3.

3. In my report above referred to, I expressed a strong opinion that the power of trying European British subjects should not be given to Native Civilians appointed in India. This I supported by showing that an outcry would be raised in favour of giving to uncovenanted officers, who had done good service and had done well as Magistrates, the same powers as might be given to the Native Civilians appointed without visiting England and studying there, as is necessarily the case with Civilians entering the service by the regular mode of competition. I would beg to refer to that report, and specially here I would quote from paragraphs 3 and 9. "The great difficulty in making any change in such matters is to know where to draw the line and where to stop. .... We live in an age when everything conceded leads to a demand for still more." These remarks have been most fully justified by the fact that by many organs of Native opinion the concessions now proposed are looked on as only a first instalment, while it is claimed in violent language that every European British subject should be liable to be tried in any Court, without any restriction as to the amount of punishment to be inflicted, so long as it is within the limits laid down by the Penal Code, and does not exceed the general powers of the Court trying him.

4. During my recent absence on privilege leave, I learned facts which show that, in Bengal, the feelings with which many influential but non-official Englishmen living in the mufassal are regarded by their wealthy neighbours are such as would make it very difficult for a Native Magistrate living in those parts to administer strict and unbiassed justice in disposing of cases involving Europeans.

5. The outburst of race-feeling and animosity with which this Bill has been received by both sides confirms what I learned when absent on leave. I fear that this Bill has done more than almost anything else for long has done to rekindle feelings of animosity between Europeans and Natives, and that it has thrown us back years as regards any advance that may have been made towards more cordial feelings. I fear Government cannot withdraw the Bill altogether, as to do so would give rise to the thought that violent opposition to proposed legislation would force the Government to give it up. It only remains to see what modifications should be made in the present system.

6. I think there has been a good deal of loose talking and writing on the subject. European Judges and Magistrates have been talked of as 'privileged by their race to try Europeans.' The 'privilege' is that of the prisoner or accused person. A juror who is told to stand aside as objected to is not 'privileged' any more than is he who, being unchallenged, acts as juror. The privilege is on the part of the person who can make him stand aside. It is not my privilege that I can try a person whom Mr. Tagore (whose name has so often been mentioned in connection with this matter) cannot try. It is the prisoner who is 'privileged' to claim to be tried by another than Mr. Tagore. I am not aware that much injustice has been caused by the existence of this privilege on the part of European British subjects.

7. Again, it is said, and truly said, that it is an anomaly that this privilege should exist, or that a person entitled to try a Native for theft should not be able to try a European British subject for a similar offence.

8. The question arises whether it is intended to remove all such privileges and anomalies. Many Native gentlemen possess, under section 641 of the Civil Procedure Code, a privilege possessed by no Europeans under that Code, that of exemption from personal appearance in Civil Courts. Section 640 of the same Code exempts many Native women from personal appearance in Court (except when arrested in execution of civil process). These are privileges which tend to defeat justice. Natives look on a person exempt from appearance in Court as so far above the Courts. Examination by commission cannot be as effectual for the ends of justice as examination in open Court. No European lady, however high her rank, is allowed the privilege of these Native women, many of them very uneducated and deficient in culture. Are the people who now cry out so loudly against the injustice, which they allege is caused by the privilege of comparatively few European British subjects, prepared, for the ends of justice and for the sake of equality, to give up these privileges? Of course they are not, and Government has shown no intention of removing these privileges. It is an anomaly that assessors should be asked their opinions when these need carry no weight. To remove this anomaly except by the abolition of assessors is impossible. It would certainly be an anomaly that a European lady should be forced to appear as an accused party in the Court of a person whose wife is privileged not to appear even as a witness in a Civil Court. If all privileges and anomalies are not to be swept away, I object to the removal only of those which affect Europeans while those affecting Natives are allowed to remain in full force, especially as this anomaly is productive of good.

9. I have shown in my former report on this subject why I thought that, in the interests of justice, the right of trying European British subjects should not be generally given to Native Magistrates. I regret to say that, since writing that report, I have seen ample reason to justify part of my remarks in actual life. Without going into details, I have seen and learned of cases in which influential Native gentlemen were concerned, in which, though the trying Judge doubtless intended ultimately to act impartially, he gladly availed himself of every opportunity of putting off a decision or an order which might offend an influential man.

10. The proposed Bill would abolish some powers of Honorary Magistrates who are now Justices of the Peace. I understand that in Bengal there are numerous European Magistrates not in the Covenanted Civil Service who are Justices of the Peace. Such people could no longer be appointed under the proposed amendment. Thus, to enable a few people to try cases, many will be disqualified. This will lead to the anomaly that such Europeans will be able to try Natives but not Europeans.

11. Thus, considering the state of angry feeling on the subject, and the little practical advantage to be gained from the change, I am of opinion that, were it possible, no change should be made at present. But this cannot be. The Government of India has gone too far to draw back. I think every Sessions Judge and District Magistrate should be ex-officio a Justice of the Peace, and be empowered to try European British subjects. No Magistrate has a right to be a Justice of the Peace, and it is no anomaly that one Magistrate, first class, should be a Justice of the Peace while another is not. But it is a great anomaly that a District Magistrate or Sessions Judge should not be able to try a European British subject who is liable to be tried by subordinate first class Magistrates in the same district. Government select the officers whom they are to appoint to be Magistrates or Sessions Judges in particular districts, and can thus avoid sending particular officers to districts where it would not be advisable that they should be. I think the privileges of parda nishin women are allowed to an extent never intended by the Legislature, which would scarcely intend that Native ladies who drive to a bandstand, or Native women who belong to families of low caste but wealthy, should be exempt from appearance in Court as witnesses. But, so long as this is done under High Court sanction, I do not think any Native can reasonably object if an English woman claims to be tried criminally by her countryman; and therefore I would give every female European British subject the right she now has. This of necessity implies that her husband, &c., shall possess the same right. I, therefore, think that, considering the unfortunate circumstances that have arisen, the only course is to amend the Bill so that every District Magistrate and Sessions Judge, members of the Covenanted Civil Service, shall ex-officio be Justices of the Peace and shall be able to try European British subjects, but that all European British subjects shall have the right of claiming to be tried by a Magistrate or Sessions Judge who is a Justice of the Peace and European British subject. As it would apparently be impossible to distinguish between those Native members of the Civil Service who are selected by competition and those who are appointed in India without leading to never-ending unpleasantness and assertions of right, and as I do not think the latter should as first class Magistrates be Justices of the Peace, I think only the Native members of the service who are District Magistrates or Sessions Judges should exercise the above right.

No. 1066, dated 12th April 1883.

From—G. B. REID, Esq., Acting District Magistrate, Ahmadabad,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

With reference to the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, forwarded with Government Resolution No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, I have the honour to report that the Statement of Objects and Reasons does not seem to me to give any satisfactory reason for changing the law. So long as Europeans are entitled to a trial in the High Court for all but trivial offences, it seems unnecessary to abolish one particular anomaly, especially when there is such a very strong feeling in the European community.

It is not a question which concerns the Native community or any considerable class of it, and the amour propre of a few Native Magistrates and Judges cannot be considered to weigh against the very strong feelings of thousands of Europeans.

Ten years have elapsed since the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872, and if any practical difficulty had been felt, the proposed change would presumably have been embodied in Act X of 1882, which it is now proposed to alter. This is in itself a strong argument against the existence of any present necessity.

On the other hand, if the Government of India pursue their present policy of introducing a large proportion of Native gentlemen into the service, it will be absolutely necessary for administrative reasons to give Native Judges and District Magistrates the same powers as their European brethren. It is impossible to predict, but I believe that the objection of non-official Europeans will be as strong ten years hence as it is now. It is, I think, much to be regretted that the Bill has been avowedly based on a wish to remove an anomaly instead of on the administrative necessity of having in each district a judicial officer competent to exercise the powers over Europeans in the Mufassal given to Judges and District Magistrates by Act X of 1872.

4. Speaking of the Bombay Presidency, I am of opinion that some such alteration will have to be made in the course of years, but there is not at present any necessity for it, and that the change should, at any rate, be limited to Judges and District Magistrates and officers of similar functions in non-judicial Provinces.

No. 1460, dated 13th April 1883.

From—J. R. MIDDLETON, Esq., District Magistrate, Dharwar,

To—The Commissioner, Southern Division, Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258, dated 2nd instant (Judicial Department), I have the honour to state that, in my opinion, the proposed change in the law is, in this Presidency at least, quite uncalled-for. For many years to come the number of cases in which inconvenience would be caused by the present law will be very small. I have not seen a single instance quoted in which inconvenience had been felt. The Bill has been justified on the ground that cases may arise, for instance in Kanára, where the Judge is a Native, in which inconvenience might be felt. Practically, therefore, the present law is not found to be defective. Public opinion in favour of Native Judges and Magistrates was slowly ripening, and, if the Bill had been deferred until the number of these Native officers had increased, and the experience of a few cases had brought the disadvantages of the present law prominently to notice, the change would have met with little or no opposition.

2. Setting aside, however, the policy of making the change when there was no pressing necessity for it, and when it was certain to stir up bitter race animosities, I consider that the removal of the restriction which prevents Native officers of experience and proved ability from trying European British subjects is quite justifiable. The powers which even European Sessions Judges and first class Magistrates have as regards European British subjects are limited, and Native officers who have risen to either of these ranks may safely be invested with them.

No. 1879A, dated 31st May 1883.

From—F. H. SOUTER, Esq., Commissioner of Police, Bombay.
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

I have the honour to acknowledge the Resolution of Government in the Judicial Department, No. 2258 of 1883, dated 2nd ultimo, with copies of documents attached and noted in the margin, in which I am called upon for my opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

Statement of Objects and Reasons.
amend the Code of Criminal Procedure so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. Perhaps few legislative measures in this country have so largely roused an influential body of the people in the same manner as the proposed Bill to vest Magistrates who are Natives of this country with jurisdiction over European British subjects.

3. In expressing an opinion now on this important question I do so with the advantage of having heard the subject fully and widely discussed in all its bearings, and, with these opportunities, combined with my long police experience, and after weighing the consensus of public opinion, I have arrived at the conclusion that the proposed measure is premature, and, if introduced at the present time, will be calculated to cause serious results prejudicial to the interests of European British subjects in India.

4. It appears to me, however, that the proposed jurisdiction over European British subjects might, in the first instance, be reasonably extended to Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, and also to those members of the Civil Service nominated in India without competition.

5. The very position of such officers, I submit, demands that the existing anomaly be removed, and their official duties wholly assimilated with those of the European Civilians, as to continue so marked a distinction would not only be invidious, but unquestionably detract seriously from the object which no doubt Government had in view when conferring so great a boon as the throwing open of the Covenanted Civil Service to the Natives of India.

I regret that, through inadvertence, this report should not have been submitted previous to my availing myself of my present privilege leave.

No. 520, dated 8th May 1883.

From—H. BARRY, Esq., Acting District Judge, Shikarpur,
To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

No. 2258 of 2nd April 1883, calling for opinion on Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, as regards the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

With reference to Government Resolution marginally quoted, I have the honour to give my opinion as follows.
1. It is proposed to empower Local Governments to invest Covenanted Civilians, members of the Native Civil Service, and Assistant Commissioners and Cantonment Magistrates with power to sentence European British subjects to imprisonment for three months or Rs. 1,000 fine. It is also proposed to give all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates jurisdiction over Europeans.

2. The measure has, no doubt, been much misunderstood by the general public and grossly misrepresented by individuals who must have known its import.

3. As regards the extension of the jurisdiction of first class Magistrates, I have the honour to state that, in my opinion, no advantage would be attained by the abolition of the peculiar privilege of European British subjects commensurate with the uneasiness and alarm which, it appears, such abolition would excite.

4. I am not aware of any practical inconvenience having ever arisen from the restrictions heretofore placed on the jurisdiction of first class Magistrates over European British subjects. The only inconvenience which suggests itself to me as likely to arise in some exceptional cases is that a European charged with some petty offence might, under the present law, have to be sent to another Magistrate in the same district to undergo his trial. As, however, there are generally several European Magistrates in a district and an accused could always waive his privilege under section 454, this does not appear to call for a change in the law.

5. I do not think that objection can reasonably be taken to the existing state of the law merely on the ground that it preserves race distinctions, or that the proposed change would efface those distinctions from the Code.

6. The peculiar procedure which applies to Europeans is defensible on other grounds than invidious race distinctions. Very few Mufassal Magistrates have lived for any length of time in Europe or know very much of European customs. Both to the Magistrate and to the accused it would be a decided disadvantage, in cases against or between Europeans, to have the proceedings conducted in a language which was neither common to both, nor the language in ordinary use in the Court. Mufassal Magistrates, moreover, have not, as a rule, any special judicial training. In cases where race feeling would almost invariably arise, the appreciation of evidence would present exceptional difficulties. This seems to have been recognised by the Legislature in limiting the jurisdiction of even European British Magistrates to petty cases. It is not proposed to do away with this last-mentioned limitation of jurisdiction. It cannot, therefore, be said that the change would efface all race distinctions.

7. I do not myself think that the safety of Europeans would be at all endangered by the proposed change. I think it quite as likely that Native Magistrates would err, in such cases, on the side of leniency as on the side of severity. But the fact that the class to be affected by it regards the measure with distrust and alarm, and that no material advantage would be secured by it, is, in my opinion, sufficient ground for abandoning a measure which seems likely to produce no results but the race animosity which it is intended to dispel.

8. As to the jurisdiction of Sessions Judges, I think the case is different. There is only one Sessions Judge to a district where there may be many first class Magistrates. If the present disqualifications are preserved, the greatest inconveniences might occur. A European committed on a petty charge by a fellow countryman would have to go, in many cases, hundreds of miles, perhaps in custody, for trial by a High Court, and the expenses of the proceedings would be very considerable. A Native Civilian who has power to pass sentences of death on fellow natives of other castes and creeds must be monstrously unfit for his post if, after all his training and experience, he is not to be trusted to pass sentence of a year on a European or to transfer the case to a High Court. I fail to see any ground for disqualifying such Native officers except race-distinctions, which could not be otherwise than invidious.

No. 991, dated 19th May 1883.

From—H. BIRDWOOD, Esq., Judicial Commissioner, Sind,
To—The Chief Secretary to Government, Bombay.

With reference to Government Resolution No. 2258 of the 2nd ultimo, I have the honour to state that, though, in my opinion, it would have been advisable, for the reasons given in my letter No. 1003 of the 2nd June 1882, to have postponed any legislation for the amendment of Chapter XXXIII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, for a few years, that is, until a further and general revision of the Code became necessary, still, as a Bill has now been introduced for the amendment of the Code so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, it is necessary to proceed with it.

2. I am of opinion that the proposed legislation should be limited, at present, to the following objects:—

- (1) The exception as regards Presidency Magistrates in section 443 of the Code should be extended so as to embrace Magistrates in certain large towns, which should be named in the Bill.
- (2) In all magisterial districts, the District Magistrate, whatever his race may be, should be made a Justice of the Peace, so as to give him power to enquire into and try charges against European British subjects under section 443.
- (3) In section 444, the words "unless he himself is an European British subject" should be omitted, so as to give all Sessions Judges equal jurisdiction.

It seems obvious that an officer who is fit to be entrusted with the duties of a Sessions Judge or a District Magistrate is fit to deal with all classes of cases which may come before him, whatever may be the race of the accused person. If any member of the covenanted civil service showed by his conduct, in any way during the earlier years of his service, any unfitness to deal with any special kind of work which might come before him in a Court of Session or District Magistrate's Court, he would never, it may be presumed, be appointed to preside in any such Court.

- (4) The restriction as regards Assistant Sessions Judges in the latter part of section 444 should be retained, whatever be the race of the Assistant Judge, and, as regards Magistrates below the rank of a District Magistrate, only those should be made Justices of the Peace (whatever their race may be) who have exercised magisterial powers for a certain number of years, say for at least five years, and whose fitness to be appointed Justices of the Peace has been ascertained by the District Magistrate and reported by him to Government.

3. I do not think that any further modification of the Code of Criminal Procedure is at present desirable. The modifications I have suggested will not affect any substantial privileges at present enjoyed by European British subjects. They will not affect the limited punishments to which offenders can be sentenced by Courts of Session and Magistrates; while they will remove the invidious distinction which now exists between two classes of covenanted civil servants in respect of their power to deal with certain cases.

4. It may be right, when the Bill comes again before the Legislature, to consider whether its provisions should be extended equally to all parts of India. In the Bombay Presidency, the moderate changes of the law which I have above proposed could probably be introduced without causing any strong dissatisfaction among any class of the community.

I am directed to forward herewith a copy of a Bill (with Statement of Objects and Reasons) to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, and to request that you will be good enough [after consultation with selected officers, European and Native, in your division] to favour the Lieutenant-Governor with an expression of your opinion upon the principle of the Bill, and as to the question whether any administrative inconvenience at present arises, or is likely to arise in the future, from the exclusion of native covenanted civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges.

2. Your reply to this letter should be despatched so as to reach this office at Darjeeling by the 15th May at the latest.

No. 34, dated 10th April 1883.

From—T. T. ALLEN, Esq., Officiating Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial, Political, and Appointment Departments.

In reply to your No. 1519 J. of the 27th ultimo, I have the honour to say that, in my opinion, the proposed Amendment Bill is philosophically and logically vicious in principle, politically inexpedient, and practically impossible, should the Europeans refuse to acquiesce.

2. I apprehend that, after what has been said elsewhere, no lengthened arguments are expected in support of my opinion, and I will content myself with merely referring to the remarks of Mr. F. Stephen in 1872, and the speeches of Messrs. Thomas and Evans, with whose reasonings I entirely agree.

3. If the Bill were passed tomorrow, there are many ways by which Europeans in the mofussil could frustrate and render impossible the exercise of the jurisdiction, and I quite anticipate that any district in which such a jurisdiction were forcibly introduced would very soon be thrown into disorder and confusion, while the Baboo Civilian might be artfully driven into such blunders and misconduct as would necessarily involve his official disgrace. The elements of disorder exist in every district; they are not dead, but sleeping. A very little stimulus and organization would let them loose with formidable force.

4. It has been taken for granted all through that the administration of justice by Native Magistrates in Calcutta is satisfactory, because I suppose complaints are not made against it. Now the absence of complaints is sufficiently explained by the class of Europeans who generally appear as defendants in these courts. Without having given any special attention to the subject, I have read from time to time the newspaper report of proceedings where cases of a more important character were under trial, and the opinion I entertain is that, should any competent person consistently and steadily watch these Police Courts of Calcutta, his conclusion would be that the administration of justice in them is very far from satisfactory, and that nothing but the obscurity and poverty of the vast majority of the defendants prevents a great deal more from being heard of their proceedings.

5. As to any administrative necessity for this amendment, I know of none such at present, and I see no prospect of any such in the near future. A District Magistrate is the one Magistrate in the district who does not need to be vested with special judicial powers, having practically ceased to be a judicial officer. A reference to the High Court's Annual Report on Criminal Justice will show how District Magistrates have in late years withdrawn from the exercise of original judicial functions.

Note on the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill of 1883 by J. WARE-EDGAR, Esq., dated 26th April 1883.

Although the opinions of the officers consulted by me will not be received in time to enable me to submit, before being relieved, the divisional report on the subject called for by Government, I feel bound to put on record my views, because almost all my service, from my first appointment to Cachar in 1863 until I left Chumparun in 1882, was spent in tea and indigo-growing districts. I have had therefore perhaps unequalled opportunities of studying the conditions under which these industries are carried on, and have been forced to devote much thought to the very difficult questions connected with the administration of criminal justice in cases in which Europeans are concerned, and the best means of affording effectual protection to the Natives of the country when their interests or rights get into conflict with those of members of the dominant race. Besides this, it appears to me that some most important points connected with the proposed measure have been overlooked, both by its opponents and its supporters, and that these points, if properly understood, would go far to account for the extraordinary outburst of indignation with which the Bill has been received, especially by Europeans living in the tea districts.

Chief among these matters are the real character and history of the compromise of 1872, and the radical and irreconcilable difference between the principle of the Bill as brought into Council, and all the proposals on the subject made since 1857, including that made last year by Sir Ashley Eden, on which the opinions of the Local Governments were obtained. The Hon'ble Mr. Evans, in his speech in Council of the 9th March, gave an account of what had happened previous to and in 1872, and it is not necessary for me to repeat what he has said. I shall merely therefore supply some omissions made by him.

In the first place, he has not brought out with sufficient clearness the facts that previous to 1872 there were really two distinct questions in dispute—the question of increasing the jurisdiction over European British subjects of those mofussil courts in which Europeans presided, and the question of giving jurisdiction to Natives over European British subjects; and that the opposition to the former of these proposals was at least as great as that to the latter. In illustration of this, I shall merely quote passages from a speech made by Sir Arthur Buller on the 7th March 1857, in which he acknowledged frankly that the privilege of British subjects to be tried before the Supreme Court could no longer be maintained, as its maintenance either entailed intolerable hardship upon honest men, or ensured impunity to crime. After this admission, he enumerated the courts to which it was then proposed to make European British subjects amenable. They were the Sessions Court, the Magistrate's Court, Courts presided over by First Assistants to Magistrates and Principal Sudder Ameens, and courts presided over by Second Assistants to Magistrates and Moonsifs, and said: "It was against these tribunals that British subjects protested against all as incompetent, and against some as open to the evil influences of personal prejudice and antagonism of race." Later on in the speech, after calling attention to the danger Europeans would run if liable to be tried by prejudiced Muhammadans, he took up the question of the European courts and asked whether any of the Members of Council really thought that "the boys who acted as Assistant Magistrates, or that the Magistrates themselves, wholly untrained, as they were, to their profession, and wholly unaided either by a jury or by any competent bar, were fitting depositaries of the vast powers proposed to be entrusted to them? He imputed to these gentlemen no fault save that of youth and inexperience. Fine, manly, intelligent young fellows they were, all fully his equals, he was free to admit—many greatly his superiors in natural abilities; but still the fact was undeniable: they were young and inexperienced, and youth and inexperience were not the best qualifications for the Bench."

The meeting prevented the further discussion of the Procedure Bill for some time, and when the matter was again taken up in 1859, the proposal to extend the jurisdiction of the mofussil courts does not seem to have been revived, but there was a very evident desire in the minds of some of the Members of Council to remove the disqualification under which Natives laboured in dealing with cases in which European British subjects were concerned. In the course of the debates on this subject, Sir Barnes Peacock, then Chief Justice of Bengal and Vice-President of the Council, made the following statement :—" The Honourable Member for Bengal had referred to the section of the Charter Act which said that no Native of India was disqualified, as such, from holding any place, office, or employment under Government. The present question related not to disqualification, but to qualification. A Native was not disqualified from becoming a member of the Civil Service. He might go to England, pass his examination, and come out as a Civil Servant. He was not disqualified from becoming a Civil Servant, or, when a Civil Servant, from being appointed a Justice of the Peace ; but he was not qualified to be Justice of the Peace unless he was a Covenanted Civil Servant." It is quite clear from this that the Chief Justice considered that, under the statute then in force, a Native Covenanted Civil Servant was qualified to be a Justice of the Peace, and this opinion was not controverted by Mr. Harrington or Sir Charles Jackson, who followed Sir Barnes Peacock in debate.

In 1861 the question of extending the jurisdiction of the mofussil courts was not raised, so far as I recollect ; but there was a controversy, much of which is scarcely intelligible to me, about the powers of Native Magistrates in dealing with European British subjects charged with offences. The results were that it was provided in section 39 of Act XXV of 1861 that no person who was not a Justice of the Peace should commit or hold to bail a European British subject, and that the jurisdiction given by Statute 53, George III, clause 155, section 105, and Act VIII of 1853, to Magistrates was restricted by section 42 to Justices of the Peace. Act II of 1869 consolidated and amended the law relating to the appointment of Justices of the Peace. Section III provided that the Governor General in Council for the whole of British India, and local Governments for the territories under their jurisdiction (other than the presidency towns), might appoint Covenanted Civil Servants of the Crown in India, or other British inhabitants, if properly qualified, to act as Justices of the Peace. This description was reproduced from the Statute. It did not, therefore, affect the qualifications of Native Covenanted Civilians to be made Justices of the Peace, and this, I well recollect, was fully understood by Europeans in the tea-districts. In July 1870, Mr. Stephen introduced a Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1861, and this was referred to the Select Committee on 17th December of the same year. This Bill, as committed, contained a proposal to allow Sessions Judges to dispose of charges against European British subjects, if they did not claim their right to be tried before one of the High Courts.

While it was being considered in Committee, two circumstances occurred which had important consequences—Messrs. Romesh Chunder Dutt, Behary Lall Gupta, and Surendra Nath Banerjea, the first Native Covenanted Civilians appointed to Bengal, having arrived in India in September 1871, Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea was, very unfortunately as I have always thought, posted to Sylhet. I was at Shillong when this happened, and there met many planters from Assam. Subsequently I spent some time in the Sylhet district on my way to Cachar, and of course saw many planters in both districts. Their uneasiness and even alarm were very great. They expected that Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea would in a short time be made a Justice of the Peace, and they looked with great dread at the prospect of his being able not only to fine them heavily, but to commit them to the High Court. More than this, they assumed that there would be thenceforward a regular yearly influx of Native Civilians, many of whom would necessarily be sent to the tea districts, and in the course of time be made Justices of the Peace : and they prophesied that the consequence would be little short of ruin to the tea industry. Of course their forebodings were exaggerated, but I am bound to state that their fears of the result which might be expected to follow the employment of young and untrained Natives as Assistant Commissioners in the tea districts were not groundless, and that the planters would not have been the only or the chief sufferers. The injury done to the Natives of the tea districts, to the imported coolies in the gardens, and even to the Native officers themselves would have been far greater. The other matter to which I have alluded was a statement made in Council by Mr. Stephen on the 16th December 1871, to the effect that the Committee had received a most important paper from the Government of Bengal, containing a suggestion that European British subjects should be made, to a great degree, amenable to the ordinary criminal courts of the country. Mr. Stephen added that the matter would be considered in Committee, but that owing to its importance he wished to have it made public as soon as possible.

The position, therefore, at the end of 1871 was this : Under the existing law, Native Covenanted Civilians were qualified to exercise some jurisdiction over European British subjects. There were then three such Civilians who might be expected to get these powers at any early date, and one of them was posted to a district where he would have jurisdiction over members of the most sensitive and jealous class of Europeans in the country. All people interested in tea feared this much more than they did a moderate extension of the jurisdiction of the courts presided over by Europeans, and they knew that they could not get the law changed without the assent of some at least of the members of Government. On the other hand, all concerned in the administration of the tea districts felt that the existing law restricting the jurisdiction of the mofussil courts was intolerable, that the evils acknowledged to exist in 1857 had increased ten-fold, and that a change was absolutely necessary for the sake of the natives of the country. It was widely felt that such a change was immeasurably more important than any further removal of the disqualifications of Native Magistrates, or even the maintenance of the statutory qualification of Native Covenanted Civilians. There was, however, a very influential minority, which though strongly opposed to any extension of the jurisdiction of any mofussil courts, did not share the alarm felt by the tea-planters at the prospect of Native Justices of the Peace exercising the restricted jurisdiction. Foremost among these was the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Napier of Magdala.

The result of all this was a compromise between the majority of the Select Committee and the non-official community, under which it was agreed that the non-official community should accept the extended jurisdiction of the mofussil courts, provided that none but a European British subject should have jurisdiction to enquire into a complaint or try a charge against a European British subject. This compromise was laid before Council by Mr. Stephen on the 30th January 1872, ten days before the assassination of Lord Mayo. It is probable, therefore, that the latter knew of it. It was not discussed in Council until 4th May, when Mr. Stephen distinctly stated that there had been a compromise with the general European population; and it is perfectly clear, from the whole course of the debate which followed, that the European community were held to have accepted the extended jurisdiction allowed to Justices of the Peace and Sessions Judges being European British subjects, on condition that Native Civilians, even when appointed to be Justices of the Peace under Act II of 1869, should not have any criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. The Commander-in-Chief subsequently moved an amendment, which he described as his protest against any extension of the powers of Magistrate for dealing with European British subjects. He was unsupported in this, and Mr. Stewart, the non-official Member of Council, stated that, in his opinion, they were practically bound by the recommendations of the Committee. I think it will be perfectly clear that the majority of the Legislative Council in 1872 did not merely give up a portion of a proposed law in order to facilitate the passing of the remainder, but practically repealed a part of an existing law as the consideration for the acceptance by the European community of entirely new provisions was regarded by them with deep and traditional dislike, which was shared by one of the highest Members of the Executive Government, who would have been prepared to lead the opposition to the proposed innovation.

Personally, I have always regretted the disqualification of Native Covenanted Civilians, for I believe that the concession was unnecessary. A pledge not to employ them in tea or indigo districts would have satisfied the non-official community, and would have simply been giving sanction to a rule which should always be observed for the sake of all parties, but which is essential for the protection of the ryots in indigo districts and the coolies in tea districts. Apart, however, from the mistake which I hold to have been made in conceding the restriction in Act II of 1859, I can testify that no measure of the Government passed in my time has been more beneficent in its effects than the extension of the jurisdiction of the mofussil courts over European British subjects, and that its admirable results have been in a great measure due to its having been accepted loyally by the classes affected, instead of being forced on them without their consent. As regards the concession then made to them, I hold of course that it cannot preclude the present Government from removing the disqualification of Covenanted Civilians or other Natives, but I think that it made it the duty of the Government to do all in its power to obtain the consent of the European community to any changes in that direction before formally proposing them, and that great care should have been taken to make such proposed changes definite and clear, to leave no doubt as to their scope and ultimate effect, and to avoid unnecessarily wounding susceptibilities, or giving ground for fearing that the law could be made by the executive authorities to do more than was intended by the Legislature.

Now, I think that the present Bill can be shown to be grievously faulty in every one of these respects. The principle of the existing law is that the European British subject is to be tried by another European British subject. But to this rule there are exceptions, viz. Native Presidency Magistrates and probably Native High Court Judges, and a Native Recorder of Rangoon, should one ever be appointed. Mr. Gupta, in his note of the 30th January 1882, proposed to add two more classes of exceptions, viz. Native District Magistrates and Native Sessions Judges, the general rule remaining unaltered. In like manner, Sir Ashley Eden, the Governments of Madras and Bombay, the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, the Chief Commissioners of the Central Provinces, British Burma and Assam, and the Resident of Hyderabad all proposed some sort of further exception to the existing rule, which all manifestly meant to retain. The Punjab Government was the only one which proposed to depart from the principle of the existing law. This principle has, however, been abandoned in the present Bill which proposes to substitute what may be called an official qualification for the race qualification. I would add all District Magistrates and Sessions Judges to the present list of ex-officio Justices of the Peace, contained in section 25 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and would disqualify the class of European British subjects now eligible for appointment as nominated Justices, and substitute for this class the following four classes:—(1) Members of the Covenanted Civil Service; (2) Native Statutory Civil Servants; (3) Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces; and (4) Cantonment Magistrates. Now, in the first place, this new scheme disqualifies large classes of official and non-official Europeans, from whom the ranks of Justices of the Peace have hitherto been recruited. Taking the Bengal Civil List for the current quarter, I find two lists of Justices of the Peace for Bengal, Behar, and Orissa,—one containing those actually now resident in the Mofussil, and the second containing those now in Calcutta or on furlough, or employed under other Governments. In the first list I find the names of 37 people who would not come under any of the classes in the proposed Bill. In the second list there are, I think, 64 such names, but I feel some doubt about one or two of these. The total number of Justices in the two lists is 333, out of whom about 100 belong to classes who would be disqualified by the Bill. Among these I find officers of the Army and Navy, Deputy Magistrates and other uncovenanted servants of Government, tea and indigo planters, landowners, merchants and lawyers. Of course the appointments of the present Justices are protected by section 7 of the Bill; but that is not material to the present argument, which is that if the Bill were to be passed the Government would in the future be deprived of the services of large classes which have been found useful in the past. I may add that the power of appointing such persons to be Justices of the Peace will become even more valuable as railways got made through remote jungly tracts, and ships began to frequent out-of-the-way ports. It will then be often more desirable, mainly in order to protect the natives, to be able to vest the Superintending Engineer engaged in constructing a line of railway, or the chief officer of a port, with the power of dealing with offences committed by Europeans. From a purely administrative point of view, therefore, the inconvenience caused by the disqualification of so many classes of Europeans would be very much greater than any that could arise from the disqualification of Native Civilians rising to be Sessions Judge or District Magistrate. It is manifest that, as a matter of administrative convenience, it is desirable to have as many Magistrates as possible qualified to deal summarily on the spot with petty offences of Europeans living in outlying districts. It is also manifest that the effect of this Bill will be, in the future, greatly to diminish the number of such Magistrates, and it is very remarkable that no local Government or local official appears either to have recommended or contemplated such a change. I am wholly unable to discover any practical reason for disqualifying whole classes of Europeans, and thus diminishing the facilities for the prompt disposal of petty cases. The number of Europeans that will be disqualified is very much greater than the number of natives who will be even constructively qualified by the Bill, and it must be borne in mind that no complaint has been made against the fitness of those to be disqualified. If the substitution of an official qualification for the present qualification cannot be carried out without disqualifying in a wholesale way so many persons now qualified, and thus diminishing the facilities for dealing with charges against Europeans which it was the object of the compromise of 1872 to gain, the proposal is clearly a retrograde one as regards the efficient administration of justice.

If the classes declared to be qualified by the Bill are analysed, the objectionable character of its principle will be still clearer. I say nothing about Covenanted Civilians, but I feel bound to submit that the European community have good grounds for protesting against Statutory Civilians being at present declared qualified. The system introduced by Lord Lytton is still on its trial, and I am not prepared to declare it to be a failure, without further experience of it; but it is impossible to ignore the fact that it is emphatically condemned by many, among both Europeans and Natives, best qualified to judge, and I have not heard a word in its favour from any one whose opinion on the subject is worth having. But the most objectionable part of the Bill is that by which Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces are declared to be qualified. Covenanted Civilians and Statutory Civilians are both classes created and defined by law, and there can be no doubt as to what the terms connote, but Assistant Commissioner is a mere administrative expression, and the status and qualifications of the officers called by that name wholly depend upon executive authority. Yet of all the classes declared qualified in the new Bill, this is the one which touches the European British subject most nearly. It must be remembered that while there are only 71 regulation districts in the Bengal Presidency, including Burmah, there are about 105 non-regulation districts, and that tea is grown almost exclusively in these last. So far as I know, there is not a single tea-garden in a regulation district except that of Chittagong. Assam is non regulation; so are Chota Nagpore, Darjeeling, Julpigori, the Chittagong Hill Tracts, Kangra, Kur-eong, and, I think, the Doon. Besides this, there can be no doubt that the future of European enterprise, agricultural and industrial, lies in the wild undeveloped countries which now form the bulk of the Non-Regulation Provinces. In considering the bearing of the proposed legislation on the position of non-official Europeans in those provinces, we must not lose sight of the fact that, while the classes from whom Magistrates of districts and Sessions Judges in Regulation Provinces can be chosen are strictly limited by Acts of the British Parliament, there is absolutely no statutory restriction on the discretion of the Executive Government to appoint any person it chooses to be Deputy Commissioners in the non-regulation districts. For instance, no one but a Covenanted Civilian can be appointed Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs, except in certain cases expressly provided by Acts of Parliament, while any one may be appointed Deputy Commissioner of Cachar. Among the Deputy Commissioners and other officers who perform the duties of District Magistrates in the Non-Regulation Provinces, there are now about 50 Covenanted Civilians, the remainder being military officers or uncovenanted Europeans. As shown above, there is nothing in the law to prevent uncovenanted natives being appointed to these offices, but the officers so appointed would certainly be of great distinction and high character. There is not the same security about the Assistant Commissioners, who are now (including Judicial Assistant Commissioners) about 123 in number, several of these being natives, and of course it being possible that future vacancies may be largely filled up by natives, for, as pointed out above, the Assistant Commissioner is purely the creation of executive authority, which has in many cases changed the very title of the office. For instance, when I was first appointed to the non-regulation districts, the title was Assistant Superintendent in Cachar. In 1864 it was changed to Assistant Commissioner by an executive order. Below the Assistant Commissioners, there are about 280 officers called Extra Assistant Commissioners. These are mostly Natives, and it is no injustice to them to say that in all the Non-Regulation Provinces known to me, they are below the standard of Deputy Collectors in regulation districts. If the present Bill were passed, there would be nothing in any law to prevent the Executive Government changing the designation of these officers to that of Assistant Commissioner, and thus making them qualified for appointment as Justices of the Peace. If it be said that this is a highly improbable contingency, I answer that the improbability does not affect my argument, which is that the term Assistant Commissioner has no legal connotation, and that it should not therefore be used to describe a class in a law where clearness and definiteness are essential.

I am compelled, on the grounds above stated, to record an emphatic condemnation of the principle of the Bill, as disqualifying large classes of men hitherto qualified, whose disqualification will cause distinct administrative inconvenience, as directly qualifying one class which has not yet shown any sign of fitness to exercise the powers to be entrusted to it, and another so-called class which has no defined legal existence, and as indirectly giving the Executive Government power to extend the qualification to a large and undefined body of officers, the greater number of whom are undoubtedly unfitted to be Justices of the Peace.

To the question whether I consider it advisable now to fall back on Sir Ashley Eden's alternative proposal, and give Native Covenanted Civilians who rise to be Magistrates or District Judges the same powers that Europeans have in the same capacities, I am obliged regretfully to answer that I do not. I have always been strongly in favour of the measure. The argument of administrative convenience has no doubt been made too much of, but there are other and, to my mind, stronger arguments derived from considerations of policy and equity, which there is no need to reproduce here. I believe and earnestly hope that before long it may be possible to remove the disqualifications created in 1872; but I see clearly that it ought not to be attempted at present. Apart from the fact that this limited measure will not affect that which Government has declared to be the great object of the present Bill—the removal in toto of the "race qualification of the Judge"—there are other reasons of overwhelming weight for the postponement of the measure. Angry passions have been aroused; a deep sense of injury has grown up, as, I think, not unnaturally, in the minds of the European non-official community; vague and wild suspicions have been formed of the ultimate intentions of the Government. Such conditions make calm consideration of, or assent to, a measure like this impossible; and the evils of forcing it on the community affected by it are so great and so alarming that the Government would not be justified in incurring them. I do not desire to go into the details of the evils, which will readily present themselves to the minds of officers who have had district experience; but I would add that, under such adverse circumstances, the gift of these new powers would be eminently disastrous to the recipients, and greatly increase their difficulties in discharging satisfactorily the very arduous and responsible duties of the posts to which they are about to be promoted.

No. 135J Ct., dated 2nd May 1883.

From—LORD H. ULICK BROWNE, Commr. of the Rajshahye and Cooch Behar Division,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

In reply to Government letter No. 1518J., dated 27th March 1883, with enclosures, I have the honour to report on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, Act X of 1882.

I have consulted six selected officers in this division, of whom four are European district officers and two are natives; one of the latter is an experienced Native Deputy Magistrate, and the other the ablest of that class serving in the division.

2. None of the officers consulted have ever known any inconvenience to arise from the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges. In my own experience, Mr. Dutt was for a short time in charge of a subdivision in which two or three Europeans resided, and Mr. B. L. Gupta acted as Magistrate of Rungpore, in which there are a number of Europeans of different classes stationed at Saidpore; and in neither instance was there any such inconvenience.

3. Indeed, when the circumstances anterior to, and connected with, the introduction of the Bill are considered, it seems scarcely possible that any real inconvenience can have been felt. The Code of Criminal Procedure was amended in March 1882 by the passing of Act X of that year, and the amending Bill was under consideration and discussion for a long time previously. Though divisional and district officers were invited to make suggestions, and though it was open to the public to do so, I believe no district or divisional officer, and no non-official, ever suggested the present measure; while it is certain that it, or something like it, would have been suggested if any inconvenience had been actually experienced. I think only one person in the whole country made any suggestion in the direction of the Bill, and he was a Native officer serving in Calcutta. If this impression is correct, it seems to indicate, without need of corroboration, that the measure is uncalled for; but there is something more to be said in support of that view. There can be no want of officers who exercise the power of trying European British subjects, as the Bill proposes to prevent all European Deputy Magistrates appointed hereafter from exercising those powers; there are few criminal cases in which Europeans are the accused; and lastly, the Bill originated in the personal representation of a Native Civilian, submitted in the interests of his own dignity and that of a few other Native Civilians and nothing more.

I think it can scarcely be denied, if the denial is to be supported by facts, that, speaking generally, there has been no administrative inconvenience, and that if such has ever been experienced, it can only have been in a very few isolated cases.

4. As regards inconvenience in the future for want of the provisions of the present Bill, the officers consulted think there is no reason to apprehend any worth thinking of, though Colonel Morton remarks that if Government chose to appoint a native to Julpigoree, then, on the complaint of a coolie that a tea-planter had boxed his ears, inconvenience would result if there was no qualified European magisterial officer at the station. Mr. Wace very naturally cannot conceive that, under the circumstances of Darjeeling, any but a European will ever be appointed to the charge of that district, whether the Bill becomes law or not, and the same may be said of Julpigoree. In the Legislative Debate of March last, His Excellency the Viceroy contemplated as many as one-sixth of the total number of Covenanted Civilians being natives in the course of time. Judging from the experience of the past as to the number of natives who enter the Civil Service by competition, that time must, under the operation of the present combined system of competition and nomination, be somewhat far off, as it is not to be supposed that Government, on seeing that natives are unsuccessful in the competition, will appoint a large number of them in this country, and thus take a decided step towards displacing the competitive system and returning to one of simple nomination. So, even if there were no strong objections to the Bill, it does not seem advisable to legislate for a somewhat distant future in a matter which contains elements of uncertainty. It may be, and it seems to me very probable, that long before we reach the time when one-sixth of the Covenanted Civilians are natives, Government will find out that the present system of nominating natives, under which alone is there any chance of that result, does not answer; and new as the system is, it would be an unsound basis on which to legislate for a future time. Even if, however, the nomination system is found to answer, and the proportion of one-sixth of natives is attained, it is not, after all, a large proportion, and so few cases would have to be transferred from one district to another for want of powers to try Europeans, that I should not expect any inconvenience worthy of consideration for want of the provisions of the Bill; certainly none that would (not outweigh, but) nearly equal the disadvantages of applying them.

5. Turning to the principle of the Bill, I find in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, signed by Mr. Ilbert, the following passages:—

“The Government of India has accordingly decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions.

“With this object the present Bill has been prepared.”

The Bill does not propose to abolish the special jurisdiction of the High Court, of Sessions Judges, and of Magistrates exercising first class powers over Europeans, or to alter the limited powers of sentencing them now exercised by Sessions Judges and by Magistrates with first class powers. There is thus, it seems to me, but little principle in the Bill, which is only a measure for modifying the exceptional privileges of Europeans on a single point, and is therefore proposed in the hope of securing an advantage which, even from the view of the supporters of the Bill, can only be a very slight one, while the disadvantages of the measure from the opposite point of view are enormous.

Mr. Wace observes as follows on the limited principle of the Bill—

“If it could be pretended that on the passing of this law all distinctions between the two races would disappear from our legal procedure, one might be disposed to run some risk to secure such an end. This proposed change, however, touches but one point of distinction. The Government declares its intention of maintaining other privileges of the European, the habeas corpus, the limitation of powers of Magistrates and Sessions Judges over European British subjects. Its maintenance of these privileges is an admission of the strongest argument against this Bill. The other privilege, which it is now proposed to withdraw, rests on the same principle. Disavow the principle in respect of one, and you must disavow it as regards others, so far as logic and theory are concerned.”

6. The next point for consideration is how far the very limited principle of the Bill really applies to the case to meet which it is directed. His Excellency the Governor General, in his speech in the Legislative Council, based the principle on the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, announcing that, as far as may be, Her Majesty's subjects, of whatever race or creed, be impartially admitted to offices in the public service, the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity duly to discharge. There is first a reservation, which it may fairly be presumed was made to meet special circumstances, which it cannot be denied are found in the present case; and then, before the concession is to be applied, the subjects of it must be qualified to duly discharge the duties of the office to which they aspire. Here there arises a very important question which seems to be begged by the supporters of the Bill, viz., whether Native Civilians are qualified to try European British subjects.

7. The supporters of the Bill represent, though it is in connection with the point of doing away with an anomaly, and not with that of the fitness of Native Civilians, which is assumed or taken for granted, that as natives have been in the habit of trying Europeans in Calcutta for many * years, and giving satisfaction, Native Civilians should try Europeans in the mofussil, and if they do, will give satisfaction there. The first part of this representation has been shown by the Englishman newspaper to be a remarkable misconception of fact. Only three natives have held office as Magistrates of Calcutta during the entire period from 1856 to date, for an aggregate of about seven out of 27 years, and for 21 consecutive years no native sat on the bench. Again, out of the three Native Magistrates, one was removed because he gave the reverse of satisfaction. Thus the Bill cannot, as a matter of fact, be supported on the ground of Natives having sat as Magistrates in Calcutta and given satisfaction there. If, however, the facts were just the reverse, the English press, both in this country and at Home, have pointed out the great difference between the position of a Magistrate in Calcutta, watched by the press, the Bar, and the High Court working where false cases against Europeans are extremely rare, and obliged to be most careful in the discharge of his duties, and a Magistrate in the mofussil, without any such checks, working where a false case against a European is far from uncommon. To this I would add that, as a general rule, cases against Europeans in Calcutta are petty and easy, such as sailors charged with being drunk and disorderly (to which charges they frequently plead guilty), while cases against Europeans in the mofussil are often difficult, and the charges more serious. Very few cases against Europeans have come before me as a mofussil Magistrate in which a marked bias was not shown against the accused by native witnesses, and in which the evidence did not require much sifting. But as Mr. Ilbert has himself borne testimony to the difficult nature of such cases in the mofussil, nothing more need be said on that point.

* The present Under-Secretary of State for India said that for thirty years natives had been constantly and satisfactorily doing so.

8. On this question of the fitness of Native Civilians to try Europeans, the senior native officer consulted, Baboo Shama Churn Chatterjee, can see no difference between a civil and a criminal case, and argues that because natives have given satisfaction in trying civil suits, they are competent to try criminal cases, whoever may be accused therein. Baboo Hurry Mohan Chundra thinks natives who entered the Covenanted Civil Service by competition are quite competent to try European British subjects, but he goes on to say—

“It is my humble opinion that it is extremely probable that the Civilians appointed under the nomination system will in no way prove competent to be appointed District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, and they will therefore not only prove incompetent to try European British subjects, but for various reasons I venture to think they will probably not prove competent to do the multifarious responsible duties attached to the offices of District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, i.e., it is my humble opinion that only those Native Civilians who have got into the Covenanted Service by competition are competent to be appointed District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, or, in other words, to try European British subjects. Those of the native members of the Civil Service are competent who have obtained a liberal education in England, who have largely associated with Englishmen, and have become acquainted with their manners and customs, and have some knowledge of the inner life of English society, and who, on return from England, live more like Englishmen than natives of the country. As regards the Native Civilians who have been appointed under the nomination system, my honest opinion is that they are in no way superior to the members of the Sub-Executive Service, and have no recommendations whatever, except that they are related to some of the Rajahs. Some of these men are, I think, very inferior to some of the Deputy Magistrates. To make these inferior men, who, I beg to be permitted to say, are not fit for the Civil Service, District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, would be lowering that Service in the estimation of the public, and would, so far as I have been able to understand, give satisfaction to neither the Europeans nor the people of this country.

“My humble opinion on the first point, therefore, is that I agree with the ‘principle’ of the Bill in so far as its scope is to give jurisdiction over European British subjects to the Native Civilians who have entered the Covenanted Civil Service after passing the competitive examination held in England.”

Mr. Glazier says—

“The trial of a case affecting a European is generally difficult and complicated, and I think very few Bengalee Magistrates would be found competent to deal with such cases satisfactorily, and a single mistake would be serious. Even if the Magistrate were capable and experienced, he would be in the cruel position of knowing that if, resisting the weight of local pressure, he acquitted the accused, he would be subjected to the taunts of the native press; while, if he convicted, European opinion would similarly doubt the justice of the sentence. His position would be more difficult than that of a European Magistrate in similar circumstances, who would not be afraid of being misjudged if he convicted, and would hold cheap the murmurs, both deep and loud, of the native press, if he acquitted.

“The position of the European in this country is an isolated one. If he is so unfortunate as to become implicated in a criminal case, he will have a host of enemies to fight against single-handed, and it is of the utmost moment to him that he should have on the Bench some one who can understand his feelings and his pleas. How different is the position of a native bhadro lok in a similar position; he has no lack of friends. When the license-tax was introduced a few years ago, a Sub-Deputy Collector plundered the people wholesale for his own profit, and though the case was so clear against him that he fled to avoid trial, yet, on his ‘mokhtarnama’ being filed in the case, every mookhtar in the place signed his name.”

Mr. Newbery writes—

“At one period of my service I have had very considerable experience in cases arising amongst a low social stratum of Europeans, and I feel perfectly certain that no native, however well-educated, or whatever good use he had made of his two or three years' residence in England, would have understood the language in which those cases were conducted, or the ideas meant to be conveyed by that language.

"I do not think, also, that our Bengalee civilians would care in the mofussil to exercise the power, even if it were given them, especially in the case of the burly British loafer, who is the European British subject most frequently up for trial in the mofussil. It is very different in Calcutta, where there are European inspectors of police and European constables always within hail of the court. But the sight of a half-inebriated European ruffian, guarded only by a few puny Bengalee policemen, would, I think, be quite enough to ensure that our Bengalee Magistrate of the district would at once make the case over to his European Joint Magistrate.

"The argument that Native Magistrates trying Europeans in Calcutta have been a success, and that therefore they are likely to be a success in the mofussil, appears to my mind fallacious in the extreme, for the following reasons:—

- 1st—From the list and dates published in the Englishman, it would appear that Native Magistrates have been the exception rather than the rule ;
- 2nd—That their decisions have by no means given general satisfaction ;
- 3rd—That having an unlimited bar and public opinion to guide them, and an ever present High Court to correct their wrong-doings, there are in Calcutta checks upon them which would be entirely wanting in the mofussil."

9. As already observed, Mr. Ilbert, in introducing and supporting the Bill, observed that criminal cases against Europeans are exceptionally difficult ; and he went on to say that they put a severe strain on the judicial qualities of tact, judgment, patience and impartiality. Of the correctness of this remark there can be no doubt, and my experience leads me to the conclusion that, great as is the improvement effected in a native by a residence in England for three years, the above-mentioned qualities are not thereby developed to a degree sufficient to render him fit to try such cases, while another equally important quality, viz., courage, is very rarely developed at all. How often we see natural good judgment and a desire to be impartial rendered of little effect in a superior native by the hasty conception of prejudice ; and what an every-day matter it is to see such a man quite unable to be impartial, because he never forgets a trifling misunderstanding or difference with another, or a fancied want of respect towards himself in conduct or action, and as a consequence cherishes hatred against that other for evermore, and never loses an opportunity of doing him an injury. Though these faults are diminished by the advantages of a short residence in England, it is to be feared that a much longer residence, if not a change of nature, will be necessary before they can be entirely eradicated. As regards courage, how few of the best natives possess that quality to the degree sufficient, on the one hand, to enable a Magistrate to acquit a European with the knowledge that the order would be followed by a storm of unpopularity with the Native Magistrate's fellow-countrymen, and a series of attacks by the native press, taking the shape of accusations of incompetency or wilful injustice done out of a desire to please the ruling race ; or, on the other hand, to enable him to convict when he knows that a series of letters with editorial comments will appear in the English newspapers, dwelling on his unfitness for the post he occupies. Again, in the course of three years' residence in England, a native learns nothing of the lower class of Europeans, such as guards, engine-drivers, plate-layers, overlookers in mills, subordinate engineers, who are the very class most likely to come before a Magistrate. Not only is a Native Civilian unable to understand and follow the thoughts, feelings, and motives of such men, but there would almost always be a serious risk of his inability to understand the language they use, so entirely different to that spoken by those with whom he came in contact in England, resulting in great injustice. The native has not the advantage we have of constant daily practice for years in conversing with the lower classes of another race, who speak another language ; and how long it takes some of us to understand them thoroughly.

10. As I consider a Native Civilian who has entered the Service by competition unfit to exercise the powers with which it is proposed to invest him, it may be imagined that I hold this view much more strongly in the case of natives appointed to the Civil Service in this country on mere nomination, and without the great advantages gained by a residence in England. Judging from what I have seen and heard of these young men, they possess no qualities that specially promise to make them one whit better than any other young men who, having a good education, are appointed as Deputy Magistrates. Some are of good family and some are not, and there is little more to be said about them. Until these appointments were made, it was held that the standard of qualifications necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of officers held by Covenanted Civilians were much higher than in the cases of offices held and duties discharged by Deputy Magistrates ; and I cannot imagine how it can be expected that the young men nominated as Covenanted officers will ever be more competent to be Magistrates, Collectors, and Judges, than any Deputy Magistrates, and Deputy Collectors who give satisfaction in the discharge of their duties. So far as I have seen or heard of the nominees, they are unlikely to be ever fit for posts held by Civilians of, say, twelve years' standing and upwards as regards the discharge of the ordinary duties of Covenanted officers. Much less are they likely to be fit to try cases of exceptional difficulty, and calling for the exercise of all the highest qualities of a good judicial officer.

11. Assuming (as it seems to me incorrectly) that Native Civilians are fit to try Europeans, the supporters of the Bill say it will do away with the anomaly of two men of the same standing and qualifications, in the same service, not exercising the same powers, which is a slur on the native who is not allowed to exercise them. Nothing put forward in support of the Bill has been more fully treated than this plea. The English Press in India and at Home have shewn in letters and leading articles that India is a country full of anomalies, Hindus and Muhammadans having each separate laws of inheritance and marriage; that Native women above the lowest classes are exempted from appearance in the witness-box; and that a similar privilege is granted to men of a certain rank; all these anomalies being inconvenient, and making the administration of civil and criminal justice difficult. The following passage from Mr. Wace's letter indicates that, if the Bill passes, there will be a greater anomaly than that which the Bill proposes to remove:—

“The Government of India is, I presume, not prepared to put a Bengali Civilian in charge of a Punjab district. Is it unnatural that the European, who has conquered the Punjabi, should resent being put into a position in which the Government would not think of putting the Punjabi?”

It will indeed be an anomaly if an European British subject is made liable to be tried by men who are not considered fit to try Natives of the Punjab.

The replies that have appeared to what may be called the anomaly plea go on to say this anomaly is only a privilege like those referred to above as enjoyed by the Natives, viz., by Hindus and Muhammadans, in the shape of special laws, and by Native women and by Native men of rank in regard to exemption from appearance in law courts; that as special privileges as to choosing the nationality or race of some of the members of the Courts that try them are granted to Englishmen accused of criminal offences in Turkey, Egypt, China, and Japan, which are foreign countries, how much more should a similar privilege be granted to Englishmen and Englishwomen in India, a part of the British Empire? To these I would add the question “Are not English men and women and other Europeans entitled to the privilege granted to the Native sepoys, of choosing whether they will be tried by Europeans or Natives?”

As Mr. Glazier remarks, the anomaly and privilege which the Bill proposes to remove are the least objectionable and least obtrusive of all that we encounter in the Courts; and, as remarked by Mr. Newbery, it is after all nothing less than a great constitutional privilege of an Englishman to be tried by his peers, and one of which he should not be deprived except on the strongest grounds.

12. Having expressed my opinion, and those of the officers consulted, on the two points specially mentioned in the Government letter under reply, I request permission to say something about some other objections to the Bill.

13. The Government of India deny that there is any intention of proceeding further in the same direction, and say the Bill is a final measure. On this point Mr. Wace says:—

“It has been pledged for this Bill by its author that it has the elements of finality in it. The utterances of the Native press since that assertion was made must surely have disabused the Government mind of this fallacy. Over and over again it has been declared that this concession is accepted merely as one step towards absolute equality between Native and European.

* * * * * Let not its (the Bill's) authors shut their eyes to the fact that logic must lead them eventually to abrogate the other privileges of which at present they appear to be as stout champions as the opponents of the Bill. So far, then, from there being the elements of finality in this Bill, it seems to me but the first step to a policy the dangers of which have been fully pointed out by Sir Fitzjames Stephen.”

I agree with Mr. Wace in thinking that if the Bill is passed it would be difficult for Government to resist outcries for the extension of its principle, and that a refusal to extend it will make the Government as unpopular with the natives, whose aspirations to equality with the ruling race have been created by the Bill, as the passing of the Bill will make Government unpopular with Europeans.

14. It should, I think, be remembered that there is no general wish for the measure on the part of the natives. There is only a single class—the educated Bengali—who desires it in the least, the people generally being entirely unconcerned; if consulted, they would, I am sure, be most ready to acquiesce in Europeans enjoying a special privilege just as the Natives do.

15. Lastly, if there were no other grounds for letting things remain as they are, the strong feeling on the subject among Europeans is alone a sufficient reason for abandoning the Bill. During my long service in this country, I have never known an expression of feeling nearly so strong and so universal (or so very nearly universal), and such a remarkable concurrence of opinion among non-official and official Europeans alike, as has been elicited by this Bill. If it becomes law, then all non-official Europeans in the country, or, in other words, the one non-official class from whom Government can confidently expect aid and support in a time of need, will be alienated, and I believe Mr. Wace is correct in thinking that this class will henceforward, under a sense of undeserved injury, only take part in public business to the extent absolutely necessary for their own personal interests, and will cease to do so in order to aid the administration. All great commercial undertakings in this country are due to the capital, enterprise, and energy of Europeans, the natives only taking a small part when success is assured, or only availing themselves of what is provided by Europeans; and any measure that will make, this class less inclined to reside in India will give a serious check to the operations through which the natives have been so greatly benefited and prospered. This check will, moreover be the act of the Government, applied at a time when Government desire to encourage and promote private enterprise more than ever.

16. I have now endeavoured to show—

That no inconvenience has been experienced in the past in this division for want of the provisions of the Bill, and that from all the circumstances connected with the introduction of the Bill, it is extremely unlikely that any inconvenience worthy of notice can have been experienced anywhere.

That the expectation of inconvenience in the future rests on an uncertain basis; that if that basis proves more sure than seems likely, the inconvenience, whatever it may be, will only be experienced at a future time so distant that it is not advisable to legislate for it now; and that if the inconvenience is ever experienced at all, it will be trifling, consisting of the occasional transfer of a case to another district, and of no importance whatever when weighed against the objections to the Bill.

That the principle of the Bill is extremely limited, not bringing about uniformity of system or equality, but only depriving Europeans of one privilege out of several though they value it dearly, and thus effecting very little at a great and serious cost.

That the principle is based on the assumption that Native Civilians are fit to exercise the powers of trying Europeans, while the best of the two classes of Native Civilians, viz., those who have entered the Service by competition, are deficient in the exceptional qualities which the supporters of the Bill admit to be required for the exercise of such powers; are also wanting in experience and knowledge of the motives, feelings, and language of the majority of the Europeans likely to be tried; and that this class of Native Civilians are therefore not fit to try Europeans, while there are no grounds for thinking that the nominated Native Civilians can ever be nearly as good as the others, much less that they will ever be fit to try Europeans.

That the plea that the Bill will remove a privilege which is an anomaly has no force in the face of the many other anomalies connected with our Courts, and the privileges enjoyed by the Natives and by European British subjects in this and other countries.

That if the Bill is passed, Government will have a great difficulty in making it a final measure.

That neither the country generally, nor any large section of the people, care about the measure, but only one small class, viz., the educated Bengalis.

That if there were no other grounds for abandoning the Bill, the unparalleled feeling it has created is alone sufficient for withdrawing it as it, would be in the highest degree impolitic to alienate such an important class as the non-official Europeans, to whom Government and the natives owe so much assistance, progress, and prosperity, especially at a time when Government look to those Europeans for further important steps in the same direction.

17. For these reasons I sincerely hope that Government will withdraw the Bill. Probably the only reason why there is any hesitation about it is because the non-official European community have allowed their strong feelings in regard to it to carry them away, and have used unseemly language, some even assuming an attitude of hostility towards the Government. But in this, as in all matters, Europeans may claim to be treated as well as Natives are treated. For many years the Native Press, and especially the Vernacular Press, have systematically used most unbecoming language towards the Government, accusing it and its officers of wilful injustice to Natives, of undue favour to Europeans, and of generally bad motives. This, too, has been continuously written and published by those who knew all the time how falsely they were writing. And yet all this has never affected the measures or policy of Government in the least, and has never prevented the passing or altering of laws, or the issue of executive orders calculated to benefit the Natives. I think that in this instance the language and bearing of non-official Europeans may be overlooked also.

No. 104 J., dated 2nd May, 1883.

From—J. F. K. HEWITT, Esq., Commissioner of the Chota Nagpur Division,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial, Political, and Appointment Departments.

With reference to your letter No. 1518J., dated 27th March 1883, I have the honour to submit the following report on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

2. I called on all the district officers and Baboo Rakhal Das Halder, Manager, Chota Nagpore Estate, to state their views on the points mooted.

3. Major Lillingston, Deputy Commissioner of Hazaribagh, states that the grounds for the proposed change are, first, that Native Magistrates in presidency towns are Justices of the Peace, and exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects with the general approval and sanction of the European and Native communities, and therefore Native Magistrates in the mofussil should also exercise similar jurisdiction; secondly, that native members of the Covenanted Civil Service having been to Europe, having become acquainted with European feelings, ideas and customs, and having qualified themselves to take their places with European members of the Civil Service, should be allowed to exercise all the functions which the European members exercise; and thirdly, that by the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges, administrative inconvenience might arise.

4. With regard to the first, the Deputy Commissioner thinks that it is doubtful whether Native Magistrates in presidency towns exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects with the general concurrence and sanction of European and native communities, and that the circumstances of the presidency towns are quite different from those of the mofussil, inasmuch as in the former a strong public opinion and the presence of European advocates constitute safeguards against miscarriage of justice, which are as a rule wanting in the latter. As to the second ground, he thinks that a few years' residence in Europe is not enough to enable Native Civilians to thoroughly understand the ideas and feelings of Europeans. With regard to the third ground, he cannot conceive any circumstance under which the proposed change will result in any administrative inconvenience which cannot be obviated by the Government in the Appointment Department. It is further urged that the Bill does not go far enough to remove legislative anomalies, and that the Native Civilians who have visited England to qualify themselves for the Civil Service, knowing as they did that they were debarred from exercising jurisdiction over European British subjects, have now no good reason to complain. The Deputy Commissioner says his views on the whole subject exactly coincide with those expressed in the Delhi memorial against the Bill published in the Englishman of the 17th instant.

5. Mr. Power, Deputy Commissioner of Lohardugga, states that the principle of the Bill, abstractedly considered, is an excellent one, and that it would doubtless work admirably if the people of India were all, or for the most part, philosophers. As such, however, is not the case, he thinks it would be very unwise to engraft the institutions of a free on a conquered people. India, like Ireland, is held by the sword, and by the sword alone, and anything done to weaken the prestige of the ruling nation is injudicious. There are but two entirely logical conditions—either complete freedom or absolute subjection. If a middle course be pursued, its mainspring should be maintenance of the ruling race in its position as such.

Mr. Power adds that with non-official Europeans the most objectionable feature of the Bill is that it will expose them to greater risk of injury by the institution of false charges. This objection he considers is not unfounded, as the Native Civilian Magistrates cannot fully realise the responsibility of bringing an accused person into court. He is easily taken in by the story of the complainant who is present before him, and his countrymen will doubtless take advantage of his weakness in this respect, knowing how difficult it is to prove a false case as such.

6. Major Garbett, Deputy Commissioner, Singbhoom, while holding that, with the safeguards provided, no harm is likely to result from investing Native Civilians with jurisdiction over European British subjects, considers that there is no immediate necessity for the change, and that circumstances tend to show strongly that the policy of the measure is doubtful.

7. Baboo Rakhal Das Haldar, manager of the Chota Nagpore Estate, says that no general inconvenience is likely to result from the present state of things. He maintains that the British Government, like all other Governments, is founded on force, and deprecates any measure tending to impair that force.

8. Mr. Risley, Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Manbhoom, has submitted an excellent report on the whole question, and I cannot do better than quote below his remarks in extenso.

Mr. Risley writes—

“It would be out of place for me to reproduce here the arguments which have been brought forward against the Bill by Sir James Stephen and Sir Louis Jackson in the Times, and by Mr. Seton-Karr in the National Review. What has been said by those high authorities will, I assume, be considered at the proper time and place, and the objections taken by them having been clearly and forcibly stated need not be repeated here.

“I would submit that one point bearing upon the principle of the Bill has not yet been prominently brought out. It is a question of fact rather than of speculation, and I propose to say a few words upon it here. It is admitted in the Honourable Mr. Ilbert's speech upon the Bill, that the criminal cases in which Europeans are charged are few in number and of exceptional difficulty. It will also be admitted that, in considering whether a class of officers should be admitted to exercise a special jurisdiction, regard should be had to the question whether, under ordinary circumstances, they are in a favourable position to become familiar with the facts and combinations of facts with which that jurisdiction is concerned, and whether, as a rule, they are so conversant. Now the European British subjects who are likely to be affected by the Bill belong for the most part to one of the following classes:—

- (i).—Planters, including indigo, tea, coffee, silk and cinchona planters, and Europeans engaged in zemindari business.
- (ii).—British soldiers and sailors.
- (iii).—Europeans of the lower classes, including railway officials, mechanics, and vagrants.
- (iv).—The wives and female relatives of the persons included in classes (i), (ii), and (iii).

“Can it be said that Covenanted Native Civilians who have visited England know enough, or can know enough, about these classes, in particular about the last three, to be in a position to deal satisfactorily with criminal cases in which they are concerned? Speaking from what I know and have heard on good authority of the manner of life of Native Civilians in England,

I have no hesitation in saying that, as a general rule, they are disqualified to try these persons criminally, by unavoidable ignorance of their habits, passions, prejudices, and peculiar moral standards. It would be difficult to find two men more hopelessly incapable of understanding one another than a highly-educated native and a British soldier or sailor; and yet, for the purpose of trying a man criminally, the power of entering into and appreciating his point of view is the one thing which is most required.

"By referring to the manner of life of Native Civilians in England, I do not mean to imply that it is otherwise than creditable. If anything, I should say it is too quiet and too decorous to give them the knowledge of European life which is one of the objects of bringing them to England. I have seen something of native gentlemen, civilians and others, in Oxford, and I have heard a great deal from tutors and persons qualified to speak with authority. As a rule, I think native gentlemen in England see very little of society as it really is. They fall into the hands of philanthropic cliques, and see everything from their standpoint. They do not hunt, shoot, play games, or enter into any of the pursuits which bring young Englishmen in contact with their social inferiors, and teach them in a gradual, indefinite way how the large number of people who are not ladies and gentlemen look at things, and by what motives they are likely to be influenced. Native gentlemen in England live their life apart in an atmosphere of books and theories. At Oxford they are chiefly to be seen at the Union, where they show remarkable fluency in speaking on all subjects, and their speeches are quite up to the general level of Union oratory. But for all that they are outside the real life of the place, and outside of the practical influences which an English University is supposed to exercise. Least of all do they learn anything regarding the lower classes of Englishmen, the raw material of the Army and Navy, and the men from among whom mechanics and artisans are recruited for work in India. So far as regards the lower classes of Europeans. It may be said, however, that planters, at any rate, come from the rank of society with which native gentlemen found themselves thrown in contact in England, and that here, at any rate, their knowledge is likely to be fairly complete. Here again, however, I think that the causes indicated above, as cutting off native gentlemen in England from any adequate knowledge of the lower classes, do operate to a certain extent. Nothing is more striking in many of the criminal cases in which planters are defendants than the thoughtless school-boy spirit in which the injury complained of has been done, and the sheer ignorance which has often indicated it. As often as not, the planter is nothing more than an English school-boy, who has not made a success of his school career, and who is turned loose in India to make his living. If he commits an assault, as he frequently does, no doubt he must be punished; but if a wise discretion is to be exercised in awarding the punishment, and the culprit is to recognise the justice, the Judge ought to be a person capable of understanding all the bearings of the case. I do not think that the average Native Civilian, even though he may have spent two or three years in England, is in a position to take quite a sound view of the class of case I describe. I do not say he will necessarily deal too harshly with the European; he may let him off too cheaply. But his experience cannot have given him the knowledge and the tact which are required to treat the case properly, and in any event his order will have little or no moral effect on the offender.

"I have written at some length upon these points without having said all that might have been said. The facts are so obvious that a mere reference to them is sufficient to suggest the conclusion. I need hardly say that nothing is further from my intention than to imply any criticism upon the native gentlemen who visit England in order to study for the Civil Service. It is not their industry or ability that is called in question. It is merely alleged that from sheer force of circumstances they are so placed as to be unable to acquire certain experience which is essential to qualify them to exercise criminal jurisdiction over certain classes of Europeans. I would admit that they might possibly be competent to deal with criminal charges against Europeans of the classes which they know, though even this is doubtful. But the distinction between these classes and the lower classes, between the educated and refined classes, and the uneducated and unrefined class, is a very wide one, and I think the Indian Law Reports can furnish instances in which even European Magistrates have been unduly severe for lack of that very knowledge of their inferiors which the Bill assumes Native Civilians will acquire by two or three years' residence in England.

"Then there is the question, in some aspects a delicate one, of trying cases in which European females are concerned. It has been pointed out in one of the daily papers that criminal charges of adultery are not unknown among Europeans of the lower classes in India, and that such cases are frequently very difficult for a European Magistrate to deal with. I do not see how a Native Civilian can possibly be competent to treat such cases satisfactorily. If his training in England has given him no insight into the manners of the lower classes of Englishmen, still less can it have taught him anything about their domestic relations. Every one knows that there is much apparent coarseness and brutality in those relations, combined sometimes with real affection and good will. It is hard to expect a foreigner to go behind the mere evidence of facts on the record to draw inferences of one kind and another, and to decide on the strength of those inferences. But this is in many cases the only means of doing substantial justice. On matters like this it is difficult to write very precisely. One can only state general impressions, and appeal to general experience to bear them out.

"Regarding the question of administrative inconvenience, I have really very little to say. While there are so few Native Civilians as there are at present, it is difficult to see how the the point can become one of pressing importance. The utmost that can happen will apparently be a slight increase in the number of transfers of criminal cases from one district to another which can hardly be deemed a serious evil."

9. As for my own views of the matter, I must say that, viewed as a legislative enactment and as a matter of theory, the only objection I see to the Bill in itself is that it takes away from Government the power to give European Deputy Magistrates powers to try charges against European British subjects; but this anomaly could easily be removed by adding these officers to the list of persons declared capable of being Justices of the Peace in section 1. But the case assumes a different aspect when the political expediency of the enactment comes to be considered.

10. If the cases to be tried by native Magistrates were all ordinary cases, in which there is some truth in the statements of the prosecution, and where the accused will, at least if tried impartially, be found to have committed something resembling a crime, I do not see why a native Magistrate should not be trusted to decide these cases, even when the accused are Europeans, with quite as much confidence as European Magistrates. The average native Magistrate belonging to the class contemplated in the Bill is certainly not inferior to his European fellow Magistrates in judicial acumen, or in fairness or honesty of purpose, or in anxiety to arrive at the truth. The prevailing fault among these officers is a love of over-refining; but when this fault, as will be almost invariably the case, in the class of officers dealt with in the Act, is tempered by a calm judgment, it is not likely to lead them into error more often than even European officers of experience and sound judgment are sometimes led.

11. If, however, the case for the prosecution is, as is, too often, a tissue of skilfully concocted lies, I must say that I think that native officers, even though they are intellectually equal to their European compeers, are not so well fitted to deal with it. The case is sure to be got up from a native point of view, and is, therefore, if well got up, likely to appear true to an officer accustomed to the same lines of thought; but native officers can never be so likely to detect the points which a European Magistrate, from a knowledge of the habit and modes of thought of his countrymen, would at once fix on as showing the charge to be entirely false; and therefore a European falsely accused before a native Magistrate would be deprived of one of the most valuable sources of evidence in his favour. I entirely agree with Mr. Risley in his remark showing how impossible it is that even native gentlemen who have lived a long time in Europe should have acquired that intimate acquaintance with the thoughts and habits of all classes which is necessary for any one who is to be trusted to judge cases which are entirely false. Again I think that it is impossible that cases involving questions as to the relations between the sexes can ever be dealt with by a native Magistrate as by one who knows the habits and modes of thought of people belonging to the classes to which those connected with the case belong, and it will be impossible even to satisfy the accused persons, or even the prosecutors, in such cases, that their case has been satisfactorily enquired into, unless the officer who tries the case is a European.

12. The feeling of want of confidence in the Judge is another very strong argument against the Bill; and though I by no means say that accused persons should be consulted as to the Judge by whom they are to be tried, I must say that, before a class of the community already numbering many thousands, and likely to increase largely in number, are deprived of a privilege which they value, and are made liable to have their cases decided by Judges whom they distrust as being unacquainted with their habits and modes of thought, it should be shown that the change is one which is rendered absolutely necessary by an administrative necessity which it is impossible to evade. Nothing is more certain to create discontent than a feeling of want of confidence in the Judges who administer criminal justice; and though this feeling may be to some extent founded on sentimental considerations, and not on solid argument, it is for that reason more likely to be tenaciously clung to by the great mass of those whose valued privilege the Bill will infringe.

13. There is certainly at present no administrative reason for trampling on these prejudices; and therefore, while I myself see no reason for doubting that Native Magistrates are not as fully competent to try cases in which Europeans are accused, as European Magistrates, except in cases of false charges and those involving questions as to the relation between the sexes, yet I must say that, looking at the great dissatisfaction it would cause to the great body of European British subjects, nothing but the most imperious necessity could justify the passing of the Bill, and this necessity certainly does not exist at present.

No. 708J., dated 1st May, 1883.

From—G. N. BARLOW, Esq., c.s.i., Commissioner of the Bhagulpore Division and Sonthal Pergunnahs.
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

I have the honour to submit the report called for in your No. 1518J., dated 27th March last, regarding the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882.

2. I have consulted selected officers. I submit the replies of the officers noted in the margin in original, abstract of those of others below, and give my own opinion last.

Mr. W. Verner, Judge of Bhagulpore.
„ Cowly, Judge of Purneah.
„ Worsely, Magistrate of Monghyr.

MR. F. SKRINE, Magistrate of Bhagulpore—Considers the principles of the Bill to be as unjust as they are impolitic, because—(A) To be tried by his peers is an Englishman's birth-right, as old, nay older, than Magna Charta itself. (B) That right has been invariably respected in all enactments affecting the status of European British subjects since the very commencement of our rule. (C) The right to be tried by his own countrymen has thus come to be regarded by every Englishman in India as his dearest, indeed his only, privilege.

The principle that an Englishman should be tried by his countrymen has been invariably upheld in our intercourse with all oriental nations. Witness the capitulations which prevail throughout the Ottoman Empire, and the treaties with China, which generally remove the jurisdiction over British subjects from the native tribunal to the Consular Courts.

MR. A. WEEKES, Magistrate of Purneah—Considers the principle of the Bill unwise, unsound, impolitic and unnecessary. No inconvenience has of course yet been felt, as there is no officer of the kind contemplated by the Bill in the Purneah district.

MR. R. PORCH, Magistrate of Maldah—Is opposed to the principle of the Bill, because, upon the basis of an experience of 22 years, he considers that no European under trial, unless he be ignorant of the common ways of the country as to forgery, perjury, and fabrication of false evidence, could have any confidence in the impartiality and competence of a court presided over by a native officer, covenanted or otherwise. Native officers, by their own ways and standards of living, thinking and acting, show and admit themselves to be incompetent to deal with the ordinary issues involved in cases against Europeans, whose ways and motives they do not understand. The occurrence of any administrative difficulty is not foreseen.

MR. W. OLDHAM, Deputy Commissioner of Sonthal Pergunnahs—Points out that the first act following the rebellion of 1855 in the Sonthal Pergunnahs was to put the people entirely under European officers, because it was felt and found that native officials were incapable of treating with justice the wild tribes whom they regarded as both savage and alien, to whom they could not listen with patience and without contempt; whose positions, feelings, motives and actions they could not realize nor judge of. This want of sympathy was comprehended by the wild people, who regarded the native officials with intense mistrust and thorough aversion, as under their régime the Sonthals were at the mercy of every intriguer who knew how to employ the machinery of the native courts. Since 1873 a few Sub-Deputy Magistrates and Collectors have been employed in the district, with petty powers under the supervision of European officers; and since 1882, one picked native Deputy Magistrate has been in charge of a minor sub-division. As regards the sub-deputies, there has not been one whose conduct in cases Mr. Oldham, during his term of office, has not had occasion to animadvert upon as approaching that which has been assigned as a chief cause of the Sonthal rebellion. As regards the picked Deputy Magistrate in charge of a sub-division, he has worthily fulfilled the trust reposed in him. Nevertheless several petitions have been received during his short incumbency, complaining that it is contrary to Government orders to employ a native officer, and asking that an European may be sent.

This review has two aspects. If the competency of an ordinary Native Magistrate to administer a Sonthal sub-division can be challenged for the specific reasons set forth, as it certainly is challenged, the competency of a still higher class of native officers to try Europeans is to be challenged on precisely analogous grounds—foreignness of feeling, want of sympathy, and the ease with which the machinery of the courts can be manipulated against the Europeans. The other view is that with the distinction so prominently drawn by the people of his district between a European and Native officer, it cannot but have an ill effect for it to be seen that Europeans are amenable to a jurisdiction from which the Natives shrink, and against the exercise of which they are so ready to appeal.

Mr. Oldham has made successful efforts to gain intimacy with some of the Native officers with whom he has been brought into contact during his service. He has been struck invariably not only by the want of sympathy with which his native intimates regarded such a race as the Sonthals for instance, but by the mingled aversion, disgust, and contempt with which they looked upon them. Precisely the same feeling was evidenced as regards Europeans of the lower orders, especially when they were uncouth, rough, and noisy. It is not likely that the residence of a Native Civilian in England would impart to him much sympathy with or knowledge of the lower orders.

Instances are given of the great severity with which Native Officers punish crimes of violence, and of the manner in which they regard violence, no matter how extenuating the circumstances under which it was used; and it is noticed that the most frequent class of cases in which Europeans are concerned are those in which violence has been used by them, with or without extenuating circumstances.

As regards persons accused of offences, it is a common fault of the Magistracy to be guided by knowledge gained otherwise than in court. Few officers are free from this, and the evil exists in proportion to the extent to which the officer is accessible to, or subject to, extraneous influences.

Native officers, in Mr. Oldham's experience, have shown this tendency in a far greater degree than their European colleagues, and he has never known a native officer who regarded this tendency as an evil.

Generally it is a fact that mofussil justice is very far from perfect. At present, cases in which Europeans are concerned are those which are tried with the greatest care and the most consideration. The new Bill would take away this distinction in a measure. They would receive, in exchange for the good law and the justice of the presidency, the more careful law of the mofussil in all its inferiority. They would fare worse than this, as they would be tried by men incompetent to try them. They would be not only misunderstood, but be tried by courts exposed to extraneous influences.

Another difficulty, not insurmountable, but likely to be practically embarrassing, is the fact that Europeans in this country do not pay to mofussil courts, with their rough and undignified appurtenances, the respect which they would pay to similar tribunals and officers at Home. Grave scandals would occur, and the accused might become involved suddenly in most serious consequences, and liable for acts which, with a European officer dealing with him, he would have no opportunity or temptation to commit.

The Deputy Commissioner is therefore opposed to the principle of the Bill. On political grounds it would be impossible to put it into force in his district, and the same reasons must have some application elsewhere. It would operate to the serious disadvantage of the European community. It would involve complications of which, without it, there is no risk, and it would embarrass the Native Civilians whom it invested with powers.

The Deputy Commissioner can imagine no administrative difficulty as likely to arise if the Bill be not passed, as certainly none exists now.

BABOO SOSHI BHUSAN DUTT, Deputy Magistrate of Muddhepoora—Although there is no administrative difficulty now, thinks it may be felt hereafter, when the number of Native Covenanted Civilians increase, and as crime increases with the increased influx of Europeans into the country. Is of opinion that, "however good in principle the Bill might be, considering the present state of feeling, its passing into law will unnecessarily create a breach between the Europeans and Natives."

BABOO WOOMA CHURN BOSE, Deputy Magistrate of Banka—Europeans have waived the valued privilege of being tried by their countrymen, so far as regards their amenability to native Judges in civil matters, and also in criminal cases in presidency towns. Native Judges and Magistrates have hitherto discharged their duties in these cases with integrity and impartiality; therefore there can be no wrong in extending the system prevailing in the presidency town to the mofussil. It is true, there is between the European and native Magistrate an essential race difference, which is a judicial disqualification in the latter, and renders him unfitted for exercising the powers proposed to be vested in him, owing to his ignorance of European ways. But the jurisdiction over Europeans is only to be granted to carefully selected native civilians, who have made their way into the service by competition and sojourn in England, and who thus have had opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of, and insight into, European ways. There still remains the question of difference of race. If native civilians are open to the charge that on this account they are rendered less possessed of tact, judgment and impartiality, or if it renders Europeans less disposed to submit and confide in their jurisdiction, then the powers contemplated in the Bill should not be conferred.

MR. S. S. JONES, C.S., Sub-divisional Officer of Deoghur—Cannot say that members of the three first classes named in the Bill are not competent to try European British subjects, or maintain that all British subjects are entitled everywhere in India to be tried only by European British subjects. In towns they are not so tried. The question is one of administrative ways and means, the end being good government and the contentment or acquiescence of those affected by any legislative change removing a felt difficulty. Knows of no administrative difficulty as yet to have arisen, nor likely to arise within the next ten years.

MR. W. SMITH, Sub-divisional Officer of Doomka—Disapproves of the Bill. Had experience in European cases at Rajmehal for four years (probably at the time of making the railway). Some of the parties were newly arrived Scotch women, and cases between husband and wife; cannot conceive it possible for any native Magistrate to have dealt with such cases successfully. He could not have understood the language used, or appreciated the domestic differences involved. He would have found it difficult to have his authority or office respected, specially while the parties were angry; and the attempt to deal with a simple offence might have led the European concerned to become involved in a serious one.

BABOO SHARODA PROSHAD CHATTERJEE, Personal Assistant to Commissioner—Thinks the present system under which the most highly-educated native of India cannot try a European British subject, while he can try any other cultivated European or American, indefensible. The pleas which have been urged against the Bill, viz., the ignorance of the native Judge as regards the habits of, or want of sympathy with, the European British subject, apply in the same force to the other cases referred to. The only intelligible ground that can be adduced against the Bill is that the change in the law would lessen the prestige of the conquering race in this country, but the persons (Europeans) likely to appear as criminals belong to the lowest social strata, and the trial of these cannot lessen the awe and respect which the name of an Englishman inspires in India.

Criminal statistics (in this part of the country at least) do not bear out the assertion that Europeans are likely to be harassed with false complaints. The number of these is small.

BABOO GOSAIN DAS DUTT, Deputy Magistrate of Kissengunge.—It is impossible for any man holding liberal views to deny the expediency of removing distinction founded merely on differences of race or class, provided that the evil consequences of such removal do not more than counterbalance the benefit that must naturally result from action based on sound political principles, and provided that the proposed change is one of sufficient magnitude to justify the rousing of an opposition which, even though it be unreasoning, is in itself an actual evil. Thinks that there is very little or no probability of administrative inconvenience arising if the Bill be not passed. The powers, if granted, should only be given to those covenanted civilians (native) who have come back from England, and are acquainted with the manners and customs of the people whom they will have to try. Otherwise, to extend the jurisdiction to covenanted civilians who have been selected in this country, would be to put up a tribunal quite ignorant of the manners and habits of the people whom they have to try, and consequently the results of such trials are never expected to give any satisfaction.

3. My own opinion is as follows:—I concur in all the reasons which have been adduced by the various officers who have objected to the Bill. I sum up my objections thus—

- (a.)—Native Magistrates, &c., are incompetent to try Europeans on account of their ignorance of the habits, actions, and modes of thought of the Europeans. The disqualification extends to the covenanted native civilians who have visited England, as it is impossible to suppose that a three or four years' residence in that country, on the part of a youth, for the purposes of study, can have given him a really practical and sympathetic knowledge of the European character. It extends in the fullest degree to those who have never been to England (and who are likely apparently to form the bulk of the officers employed in the future), and upon this head it seems sufficient to ask the question whence, with the existing state of inter-communication between Europeans and natives in this country, can these last be supposed to have acquired their knowledge of European character and ways?
- (b.)—The proposed change, if carried out, will place the Europeans under greater disadvantages than at present. Whatever may be the case in the large presidency and other towns, it is an undoubted fact that in the mofussil a certain respect is felt for a European, as such, whether it be in the case of an official or settler. In the latter, the protection thus afforded is one of the few compensations enjoyed for the life of isolation which he lives. If the right of being tried by his countrymen is taken away from the European, increased recourse to false cases and such like will certainly be had by those who resort to such practices.
- (c.)—Native officials in the mofussil would not be able to command respect for themselves and their offices. This would specially be the case with Europeans of the lower orders, and very grave scandals would be the result. This is a real practical danger which will be testified to by many officers. The argument that this difficulty has not been felt in the exercise of jurisdiction by civil courts over Europeans is not a safe one, for the temper of an accused in a criminal court is quite distinct from the attitude of the parties to a suit in the civil courts.
- (d.)—The passing of the Bill will widen and perpetuate the breach between Europeans and natives that has already been opened by its proposal. There is no doubting the depth of the feelings that have been already aroused. Europeans and natives of enlightened character, who have worked together heretofore with common feelings and single aim, are almost to a man divided upon the present subject, where, that is to say, the latter support the Bill; for as a fact only a few of the advanced section of the native community are interested in the matter. The bulk of the people are ignorant even of the proposals, and, if I am not mistaken, the old-fashioned native of good degree, when he came to understand the measure, would be astonished at and reject it.
- (e.)—The whole European community will be bitterly alienated from the Government. Is this politically safe? Or if there be no danger from such a state of things, is it justifiable or desirable to drive them into such an attitude? For their services in the Mutiny, and in advancing the country, are the European British subjects entitled to no consideration?

4. I believe that at the present or in the future, at all events for years to come, there is absolutely no administrative inconvenience likely to occur from matters remaining as they are and have been.

5. Although not instructed to do so, I consulted four non-official European gentlemen upon the question—selected persons, who have spent long lives in the interior of the country, living in close and most cordial relation with natives of all classes, who have, some of them, made large fortunes as the fruit of their labours. These men might be expected to give just and reasonable opinions, unaffected by the excitement that the Bill has aroused. As one man, they give their voice against the proposed measure.

No. 464, dated 2nd May, 1883.

From—W. H. VERNER, Esq., Sessions Judge of Bhagulpore,
To—The Commissioner of the Bhagulpore Division.

You have asked me for an expression of my opinion on the principle of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, and also whether I think that the present system results in inconvenience.

I am not sure that the Bill rests on any principle. There appears, however, to be underlying it some such idea as this:—If a European is allowed to try a native of this country on a criminal charge, a native of the country should be allowed to try a European on a similar charge. Judging by much of what appears in print, the arguments of those who entertain this idea are that one man is as good as another, that one race is as good as another, that a conquering race is no better than a conquered race, and so on. On the other hand, the arguments of those opposed to the idea are often that one man is better than another, that a conquering race is superior to a conquered race, and so on. Arguments of this kind lead to no conclusion, are dangerous, and, it seems to me, on a question of practical government, irrelevant.

The probable results of the Bill appear to me the best guide in determining whether its principle is sound, if that above noted can be called a principle. I divide the results into advantages and disadvantages.

I.—ADVANTAGES.

First advantage.—Proclamation or advertisement to the world that, after a competitive examination, selection by Government, or some other test, natives of this country are entitled to sit in judgment on British-born subjects.

Second advantage.—Gratification experienced by natives of India by this proclamation or advertisement.

Third advantage.—Gratitude thereupon.

Fourth advantage.—Administrative convenience.

It is possible to underrate the importance of the first of these advantages. But it should be remembered that the true liberal is a man of ideas, and in the interests of the nations at large these ideas should be proclaimed. I do not attribute much weight to the second and third advantages. The gratification will be confined to a small section of the community, and the gratitude to one still smaller. The fourth advantage, namely, administrative convenience, requires consideration. Were it apparent that by the Bill the administration and government of the country would proceed much more conveniently, there would be at least one practical, as opposed to a sentimental, argument for the Bill. But as a matter of fact the existing system presents, and seems likely to present, no material inconveniences. The additional administrative convenience secured by the Bill would be infinitesimal.

II.—DISADVANTAGES.

First disadvantage.—Dismay of European British subjects at the loss of a highly valued privilege.

Second disadvantage.—Race exacerbation.

Third disadvantage.—Check to the material prosperity of the country.

Fourth disadvantage.—Comparative unfitness of natives of this country for the trial of Europeans.

The first of these disadvantages, like some of the advantages previously noted, is to some extent a matter of sentiment. In the one case, however, the sentiment is of mushroom growth, while in the other it is like a tree which has become deeply rooted in the lapse of centuries. The second disadvantage is momentous. A measure which must in a country like India increase race antagonism is, so far, condemned. The most ardent liberal, the man of the most advanced views, would probably admit this. To those who hope for a time when the peoples of India will freely join in the government of their country, there could be no greater blow than the present Bill. What might come last has been put first; what might have been the crown of the edifice is now a stumbling block in the path of the builders. The third disadvantage arises from the fact that anything which promotes alarm, race antagonism, or a feeling of distrust, whether against the people or the Government, must tend to check the influx of European capital; and most men who have thought over the matter agree that the great material want of India is capital. About the fourth disadvantage there can, I think, be little doubt. Owing to many causes to which I need not refer at length; a native gentleman would, when trying a European British subject, stand at a disadvantage beside his European compeer. No doubt by a residence in England this comparative unfitness would be lessened, more especially in those rare cases where, owing to emancipation from caste feelings and other fortunate circumstances, the Indian gentleman was able to become intimate with English people, English habits, thoughts and feelings, and English family life. But it may be stated without fear of contradiction that ceteris paribus, the European officer will be more fit than the native to try Europeans. It may be said that by a parity of reasoning native officers are more fitted than Europeans to try natives; but without entering upon the discussion of this question, and of certain political questions connected with it, it is sufficient to say that this, even if admitted, forms no argument. It can hardly be maintained that because Europeans, though more unfitted for the purpose than natives, try natives, therefore natives, though more unfitted for the purpose than Europeans, should try Europeans. Two blacks do not make a white.

The disadvantages of the Bill appear to greatly outweigh its advantages, and it must be remembered that it is for the advocates of change to prove their case.

No. 132, dated 9th April, 1883.

From—F. COWLEY, Esq., Judge of Purneah,

To—The Commissioner of the Bhagulpore Division.

In reply to your memorandum No. 455J., dated the 2nd, and received on the 5th of April, I have the honour to state my opinion on the Bill No. VIII of 1883, to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

2. Section 2 of the Bill is permissive, and empowers the Local Government to appoint persons, whether Europeans or not, holding certain offices, to be Justices of the Peace; but section 3 introduces a complete change, and directs that all Sessions Judges and District Magistrates shall, in virtue of their respective offices, be Justices of the Peace. The Bill then empowers any native Sessions Judge or District Magistrate to try European British subjects.

3. The reasons assigned for the Bill are that "it was thought anomalous that while natives of India were admitted to the Covenanted Civil Service, and held competent to discharge the highest judicial duties, they should be deemed incompetent to be Justices of the Peace and to exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects outside the presidency towns."

4. If this be an anomaly, it arises out of the position of Europeans in this country. Englishmen conquered India by force of arms; they hold it in a great measure by the prestige which still attaches to them as the conquerors, and any change which will be interpreted by the great mass of the people in diminution of that prestige ought to be avoided, if British dominion in India be worth retaining. In the eyes of the natives at large, and more especially of the turbulent and uneducated among them, the effect of the Bill, should it become law, must amount to a degradation of the personal status of Englishmen. To those races in India among whom our native army is recruited the propositions of the Bill must be a greater anomaly than the disqualifications which it is sought to remove.

5. If the Bill become law, a few natives will have received, or will be in a position to receive, authority to try European British subjects; but the benefit, if there be any to the administration, can only be gained, so far as my experience goes, at the expense of the feelings of by far the greater portion of the present European community in Bengal.

6. It is in the interests of justice that any person placed on his trial charged with an offence should have confidence in the court which is to try him, and should feel that the court is capable of fully understanding his actions or omissions; and the privilege or right of trial by one's own countrymen can be justified on this ground.

7. Natives of India, who have not been educated in England, cannot enter into the feelings and motives which prompt Englishmen, and more particularly Englishwomen, to action, and a native Judge or Magistrate in that position is, on that ground, not so qualified to deal with Europeans as is a countryman of the latter. Some of the native gentlemen who have been to England might have the necessary qualifications; but a general rule should not be based on a few exceptions.

8. On litigation generally, the views of natives and of Europeans differ materially. Some years ago, when I was in Chittagong, the Magistrate-Collector visited a village in that district, and was told that the family of a young man who had then recently died at a comparatively early age, had sustained a great loss because the young man, though not a lawyer, only a litigant, had already successfully fought out a number of cases in our courts. The narrator admiringly added—"What would he not have done had he lived longer." This love of litigation is general, and is always borne in mind by Judges and Magistrates. It is characteristic of the people in Bengal. I believe few Englishmen who are not professional lawyers would ever think of either profit or pleasure in litigation, or would not rather avoid it.

9. I have on many occasions found courts, presided over by native gentlemen, rejecting evidence, almost as a matter of course, because it consisted of statements made by relatives or dependents of one or other of the parties. Would a general assertion of that description be frequently or ever used in courts of justice in England? Such reasoning implies that perjury and subornation of perjury are believed to be ordinary weapons of attack and defence; and it shows that judgments are based largely on the probabilities arising out of the circumstances of the cases under inquiry.

10. It is not, however, only in modes of thought and characteristics, but also in habits of living, in social and domestic institutions, that Europeans and natives differ. A native, however well educated, must find it difficult to understand a European; and I therefore think that the objection of Europeans to being judged by natives rests on more than a sentimental foundation.

11. Englishwomen are more disadvantageously situated in this matter than Englishmen. Is it not even an indignity that European ladies should be liable to be tried by men who allow polygamy, and who regard females as inferior beings, not fit to be trusted to appear in public.

12. It may be urged that natives are tried by Europeans; but this is an anomaly which probably cannot be removed till Europeans cease to govern India, and which exists within comparatively narrow limits. Most trials of natives are presided over by native officers, and in all sessions courts in Bengal trials are held either with assessors or with jurors, some, generally all, of whom are natives. Even if one admit, which I do not, that natives object to being tried by Europeans, that is no reason why Europeans should be unnecessarily subjected to a tribunal which they deem to be objectionable.

13. It is said that race-feeling should be allowed no weight. That is true if the term be used in an invidious sense ; but if it mean superior trust in men believed to have inherited those qualities which have given actual pre-eminence to any particular race, its existence cannot be ignored in practical legislation.

14. In a country like India, where many different races exist side by side, and where personal privileges are extensively recognised, legislation should studiously avoid raising questions of race unnecessarily. Judged by this standard, and by the result of its introduction, the Bill must be condemned.

15. I think the Bill is erroneous in principle, because it tends to place certain persons who may be charged with offences under disadvantages to which they are not now subject. It can only be justified on the ground of some existing and definite administrative difficulty ; it is entirely unjustifiable if it be based in any degree on the wish of individuals to exercise jurisdiction. Where no legal or moral principle is involved, that person has the right to the greater consideration who has the greater interest at stake. Whether, then, is the question now in issue of more importance to the accused or to the Judge? Clearly a Judge, acting simply as such, has nothing to gain or to lose by trying any particular person. It is not alleged that the present system enables criminals to escape justice, and till there be administrative necessity for a change, there is no good reason why a change should be made.

16. It has been suggested that opposition to the Bill indicates a wish to hinder educated natives of India from advancing socially and politically ; but this is wrong. Ample field for their energies is being opened out to them in the system of Local Self-Government now under consideration.

17. The question of administrative inconvenience raised in connection with the Bill hardly falls within my province ; but I fail to see that any such inconvenience as would justify the Bill has arisen, or is likely soon to arise. If it should ever hereafter arise, it might be met by giving the Local Government authority to invest selected Magistrates of Districts or Sessions Judges with the necessary authority. I myself, however, see no present likelihood of that necessity arising.

No 508 J., dated 21st April 1883.

From—C. F. WORSLEY, Esq., Magistrate of Monghyr.

To—The Commissioner of the Bhagulpore Division.

With reference to your No. 456J., dated 2nd instant, forwarding copy of letter from the Judicial Secretary to the Government of Bengal, No. 1518J., dated 27th ultimo, on the subject of "A Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects," I have the honour to report as follows :—

2. In one of two reports which, as Magistrate of Mozufferpore, I submitted to the Government in 1880 and 1881, on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, Act X of 1872, I suggested myself, (1) that Native Civilians holding the appointments of Sessions Judge and District Magistrate should be Justices of the Peace by virtue of their appointments ; (2) that the Government should be authorized to appoint such Native Deputy Magistrates as it might think fit to be Justices of the Peace ; and (3) that the privilege of selecting their own court of appeal should be withdrawn from European British subjects in cases tried by Magistrates. I based my first proposal on the grounds that it was anomalous that an officer in the high position of a District Judge or District Magistrate should be debarred from exercising powers possessed by his own subordinates, and that if such an officer was competent to discharge properly the important and multifarious duties which devolved on him generally, it was unreasonable to suppose that he was unfit to try a European British subject. My second proposal was founded on the experience which I had gained as a District Magistrate, and in the course of which I had known Native Deputy Magistrates and Native Subordinate Judges to act with impartiality and due consideration towards European complainants and witnesses in criminal cases, or towards European parties and witnesses in civil suits. Some of those native officers enjoyed the fullest confidence of the non-official European residents of the Mozufferpore district. My third proposal was dictated by a sense of the injustice which might, at any time, be caused by a wealthy appellant compelling a poor complainant to defend a case before a distant appellate court, and of the unfairness of allowing a convicted person of a particular race to take his choice of two appellate courts which the law presumed to be equally competent to hear his appeal.

3. I still retain the opinion which I formerly expressed on the third point ; but on the first and second points I have seen reason to modify my views.

4. I admit that I was wholly unprepared for the exhibition of angry and stormy feelings which the present Bill has aroused among Europeans in India. Some of this animosity sity may be the result of ignorance, some the effect of example ; but I feel sure that in the main it is far too real and serious to be treated as a passing storm. One effect of the agitation and counter-agitation that have been set on foot has been to place before the public all that can be possibly urged for or against the Bill ; and, for my own part, I am bound to say that I can no longer regard the changes proposed in the Bill merely in an administrative point of view. To estimate "the principle of the Bill" aright, it seems absolutely necessary to take into account the state of social relations between Europeans and Natives, which, though apparently friendly, and in some instances cordial in recent years, seem, when put to the test, to have rested generally on little solid foundation. In such a state of society, I cannot consider the principle of the Bill to be sound. If the Bill becomes law, it is only too probable that the European community will separate itself more than ever from the people of the country ; that the position of the Native Civilians who may be appointed Justices of the Peace will be made extremely unpleasant for themselves in civil stations ; that on the occasion of every trial (for some years at least) of a European British subject by a Native Magistrate in the Mofussil, bad feelings will be excited, and that an attitude of sullen hostility to the Government of India will be maintained by non-official Europeans throughout the country.

5. While I wish to state emphatically my own belief that Native Civilian Judges and Magistrates would be very unlikely to misuse their powers as Justices of the Peace, and that their sympathies would be more with the Europeans than with the Natives of their districts, I can well understand the natural preference which Europeans charged with criminal offences must feel for courts over which their own countrymen preside, and, considering the peculiar privileges enjoyed by certain classes of natives—privileges which, in some respects, are calculated to defeat the ends of justice (e.g., it is impossible for a Judge to observe the demeanour of a purda-nashin witness, or to feel satisfied always of the identity of such witness),—I submit that nothing short of administrative necessity should be made ground for withdrawing from European British subjects a privilege which they have shown in the most unmistakable manner that they very highly cherish, and which is not productive of any injustice whatsoever. I beg, therefore, to submit my opinion that at the present time, and under present conditions, the principle of the Bill is not sound, and that infinitely more harm than good will be done by proceeding further with the Bill.

6. With regard to the latter part of the Government letter, I have no hesitation in stating that neither in this district, nor in any other district in which I have served, has any administrative inconvenience arisen from the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges. In every Behar district there are always one or more Justices of the Peace besides the Magistrate of the district ; and until the number of Native Civilians becomes very much larger than it is at present, I do not see how any administrative inconvenience can possibly arise.

7. I have not thought it necessary to enter into any lengthy arguments for or against the Bill, as everything that can be said on one side or the other has already appeared in the newspapers or in petitions, and I presume that it is my opinion, more than lengthy reasons, that is required.

No. 258M., dated 7th May, 1883.*

From—N. S. ALEXANDER, Esq., Officiating Commissioner of the Dacca Division,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

With reference to your letter No. 1518J., dated 27th March last, regarding the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, I have the honour to submit the following report for the information of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and to submit annexed extracts from the reports of certain officers whom I have consulted, and my notes thereon.

2. In my opinion the Bill as it stands steers an unfortunate middle course. It goes far enough to rouse the indignation of one powerful section of the community, while it does not go far enough to satisfy the cravings of another ; and as such it must be condemned as impracticable and ineffective. To give half a dozen Civilians powers to try Europeans will not remove any anomaly, or cause to cease any administrative inconvenience, for the reason that inconvenience is only likely to arise in cases which occur in sub-divisions (in sudder stations there must be generally one European officer with the powers of a Justice of the Peace).

This being the case, a Bill which does not invest all Sub-Divisional Officers with powers to try Europeans is simply a nullity. The Bill as it stands will certainly not remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions. If such is to be carried out, very many officers not mentioned in the present Bill would have to have these powers conferred on them.

3. I see no objection on principle to Government being empowered to invest Native Civilian—those entered in clause (a) with the powers provided in the Bill, if it be granted that such officers have really attained the status of European gentlemen by their education, habits of life, and through general intercourse with Europeans; but it may not be good policy for Government to give such powers.

4. As regards the officers specified in clauses (b), (c), (d), in my opinion to confer on them such powers, and not to confer them on any of the many able and educated Deputy Magistrates and Sub-Divisional Officers of Lower Bengal—such men as Nawab Abdool Latif, Baboo Ram Sankar Sen, and others—would not only be invidious, but doubtless unintentionally, yet distinctly, casting a slur on the latter officers, and be as great an anomaly as any that the Bill is supposed to do away with.

5. There are out of the sudder stations only two places in this Division where many Europeans reside, viz., Naraingunge and Goalundo, to which places only also steamers with European commanders ply. There are no indigo planters, and only one or two traders in country produce, who reside away from these two places and the sudder station. At Naraingunge there has been hitherto posted an European Magistrate, and till Mr. Badshah was posted, the same was the case at Goalundo also. There have not hitherto been any cases in which any administrative inconvenience has occurred in this division, nor does it appear to me that any are likely to occur, except perhaps at Goalundo. Hitherto the Europeans in this place charged with any offences have been content to waive their privileges and submit to be tried by Mr. Badshah (such cases have of course been petty ones). A case might perchance any day arise, in which the defendant might refuse to waive his privilege, and this might cause some inconvenience to parties, but not, in my opinion, to any very appreciable extent. Furrerdpoore is only 20 miles off, and the Magistrate might easily go out that distance, dispose of the case, and return within a day or two to his head-quarters.

6. Mr. R. C. Dutt, district officer of Backergunge, writes:—"As the extensive scheme of railway communication now in the course of rapid execution is fully developed, there would hardly be a district in Lower Bengal where criminal cases implicating railway officials or European settlers would not sometimes occur. The number of Indian members of the service, of the rank of District Magistrate or District Judge, will be greater, and the districts available for them under the present law will be fewer. The difficulty which it is now proposed to pass over will have to be faced a few years hence, and perhaps the same remedy will have to be proposed, the same agitation would be excited, and the same bitter and painful feelings evoked." It seems to him to "be far better, now that the question has arisen, that it should be finally set to rest, and it can only be finally solved in the way in which the Government of India has proposed to do it."

7. Mr. Dutt goes on to say:—"It will not strengthen a district officer in keeping peace in his district, for which he is responsible, when he is told, and the people of his district are told, that he has no power over one privileged class of people; that he cannot punish and cannot deal with a disturbance if committed by that class, perhaps even in the bazar of the station in which he resides; and that for dealing with such cases he must have recourse to the authorities of a neighbouring district. It is not desirable that the people should be told that in districts administered by native officers there is no redress against petty acts of violence by European offenders unless the complainants choose to seek such redress by submitting themselves and their witnesses to the hardship and inconvenience of travelling to a different district. Unfavourable opinions will be formed by the people of an officer in whom Government seems not to repose full confidence, and who is not empowered by Government to keep all classes of people in his district equally in order. It is to be judged whether it is desirable to weaken the hands of a district officer who is held responsible by Government for the peace and criminal administration of his district. The real question was decided when it was decided that the Indian members of the Covenanted Service should be allowed to hold executive and judicial charge of districts. This was a generous and a bold concession, for with that concession the vast powers and responsibilities of ruling the people, which had hitherto been exclusively held by Englishmen, were generously shared by them with qualified native gentlemen. Having admitted them to a share of those great powers and responsibilities, having called upon them to administer districts, collect revenue, extend education, and keep down crime, having required from them the same degree of efficiency and administrative vigour and wisdom as has hitherto been manifested by trained English administrators, it is no longer possible for Government to meddle with the powers which naturally belong to that position, and which are necessary for the responsible work which has to be done. Little distinctions, small curtailment of powers, petty disqualifications based on race or caste, are out of place, are virtually impossible, when it has been decided to entrust the administration of districts to the natives of India. Legislation cannot halt where it is; it must proceed or move backwards. Shut out the natives of India from the great work of district administration, and the Amendment Bill now published may be abandoned. Make them District Magistrates and District Judges, and the powers which have hitherto been reposed in such officers, and which are necessary for efficient and successful administration, cannot be withheld. The question arose in 1872, i.e., the year after the first native of India entered the Bengal Civil Service, and it was postponed because a practical necessity for the change had not yet arisen, although men like Lord Mayo and his Commander-in-Chief, as Sir George Campbell and Sir Richard Temple, accepted and advocated the change, and saw that it was inevitable. The question has now arisen again in a practical form, as the same native officers are now getting charge of districts; and the proposal can neither be abandoned nor be postponed with due regard to the interests of efficient administration.

8. "Previous to the enactment of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872, a native member of the Civil Service was not legally debarred, as such, from exercising jurisdiction over European British subjects. Under section 3, Act II of 1869, any Covenanted Civil Servant could be appointed Justice of the Peace, and under sections 39-42, Act XXV of 1861 (the old Criminal Procedure Code), any Justice of the Peace, being a first class Magistrate, had powers to try Europeans for certain petty offences, and to commit them for trial. It was by the so-called 'compromise' between Sir James Stephen and certain non-official Europeans that by the Code of 1872, the Indian members of the Civil Service were legally disqualified to try or commit Europeans, and it was for the first time then enacted that no Magistrate or Sessions Judge should try a British-born subject, unless he was himself a British-born subject. It is well, therefore, to understand that, legally speaking, the right of which it is said the present Bill would deprive Europeans was created in 1872.

"This right of Europeans in India, as it has been called, is one which the large majority of Europeans in India, residing in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, do not enjoy, and do not feel the want of. The reason which has been assigned for still keeping intact this privilege in favour of a minority of Europeans residing in the mofussil is that public opinion is not as strong in the mofussil as in the presidency towns, and an act of injustice may therefore be committed in some remote district without its exciting public attention. This argument, which was perhaps valid twenty years ago, is entirely fallacious in the present day. The present agitation against the Bill would in itself show how strong English public opinion is in the interior of the country. The agitation which took place when Mr. Meares was punished by the Magistrate of Jessore is another instance in point. He records his simple conviction when he states that the punishment of a European in the interior would be far more keenly criticised by the English public of India than a similar punishment in Calcutta, and would excite far greater indignation. He says he records his simple conviction when he states that the liberties of Europeans are in this respect safer in the interior than they are in the presidency towns. There is absolutely no reason, therefore, for perpetuating a personal privilege which has in the present day ceased to be necessary, which is not enjoyed by the large majority of Europeans in India, and which involves a serious administrative inconvenience.

9. "The principle on which the Bill is framed is that the power to try European offenders will be bestowed according to personal fitness, and not according to the nationality of the Magistrate and the Judge. It does not remove any of the existing distinctions between native offenders and European offenders. It only removes all distinctions between European and Native Judges. The object of the Bill is not to remove or alter any of the numerous and special provisions which now exist to guard the liberties of Englishmen in the mofussil. Under these special provisions, Englishmen have the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act (embodied in the Civil Procedure Code), which the natives of India do not enjoy. They have the right of appeal in every case, which natives do not have. The District Magistrate and Sessions Judge have a far more limited power of punishment with regard to them than with regard to natives, while the humbler and less able class of Deputy Magistrates, who mainly administer justice among natives, have (unless they are Europeans and Justices of the Peace) no jurisdiction over Europeans. The proposed Bill respects all those provisions, but enacts that, with those special provisions in his favour, the European will be triable by native and European Judges alike. Indeed in one respect it adds to the privileges of Englishmen. English Deputy Magistrates who are Justices of the Peace try English offenders under the present law as stated above, but they will not be allowed to try them after the present Bill is passed. A higher class of officers, i.e., the covenanted officers alone, will be empowered to try Europeans; but among such officers there will be no distinction made on the ground of nationality. Thus the Bill involves three principles:—In the first place, it respects all the existing special provisions to guard the liberties of European subjects; secondly, it requires a high degree of fitness in the officers (higher than under the present law) competent to try such subjects; thirdly, it does not require that such highly-qualified officers must necessarily be Englishmen.

10. "The only question on which, as it appears to me, there is room for difference of opinion, relates to the extent to which legislation should be carried in the direction indicated. Should district officers and Judges only be empowered to try Europeans, or should covenanted assistants be empowered to do so under special circumstances? Should the power be confined to the officers selected by competition in England, or should it also be extended to those in this country under the Statute? As in heavy districts the district officer scarcely does any judicial work, it would be better perhaps to have a provision for empowering specially selected covenanted assistants to try Europeans. With regard to the officers selected under the Statute, it is not apparent how the power to try Europeans can be very well withheld from them if they prove themselves fit by their work to have judicial or executive charge of districts."

11. As to the administrative inconvenience which has arisen, Mr. Dutt remarks that great inconvenience might have occurred when he was in charge of the Balasore district, to which no European officer was at the time posted. If any European had then been charged with an offence, he would have had to have been sent either to Cuttack, a distance of 100 miles, or to Midnapore, still further off, but I do not understand Mr. Dutt to say that any such case did actually occur.

12. Mr. Waller, the Magistrate of Mymensingh, writes as follows:—

“The principle of the Bill seems based on the assumption that the only logical criterion of the propriety of conferring the proposed jurisdiction on certain Native Magistrates to try Europeans is that of their competency to discharge high judicial duties, and that this being admitted, the propriety of conferring the proposed jurisdiction follows of course. It is also apparently taken for granted that all judicial disqualifications based merely upon race distinctions in this country at the present time are indefensible “Besides this mere question of moral and intellectual competency, there are other elements to be taken into account in considering the policy of the measure proposed in the Bill.

“In the administration of criminal justice it is an admitted axiom that it should be so conducted as to secure the sympathy and support of all good and orderly citizens. Now the exercise of a criminal jurisdiction over Europeans at present in this country, even by the select Native Magistrates whom it is proposed to empower by this Bill, would not only not meet with the sympathy or support of the orderly and law-abiding European population of this country, but would inevitably range on the side of the European accused person the sympathy of the otherwise law-abiding Europeans in the country, and that no matter how defensible, from the point of view of the judicial and intellectual competency of the Native Magistrate, his exercise of the proposed jurisdiction in any given case might be.”

“This, however, it may be replied, is merely the outcome of an unreasoning and unjustifiable race antipathy which no Government can be called upon to recognize or to allow to influence it in considering the adoption of measures of reform demanded both by abstract justice and good policy.

13. “An Englishman’s desire to be tried, where life or liberty are concerned, by his fellow-countryman, is, owing in a great measure to the fact that the Englishman knows that, though there may be exceptions in the great majority of cases, the English Judge who will have to try him will be a man who he knows has been brought up in certain well-defined principles, regulating in the most powerful and effective way his ideas of his duty to God and his neighbour, and that it is this code of the most exalted morality by which, in the discharge of any serious and trying duty, he (the Judge) will be more or less strongly influenced. But what do the majority of Englishmen know of the principles which guide, or the code of moral obligations that is binding on the Native Magistrate? And having no knowledge of this how can they be expected to place the same confidence in him as in an Englishman as their Judge?

14. “Again, in criminal trials especially, it is the clear right of every subject to have the best and fairest trial, both as regards the agency and procedure available, that the Government can afford to provide. Now in coming to a decision on evidence in trials, a very considerable amount of the premises on which inferences are based are axioms laid down by the Judge out of his own experience of the conduct, feelings, motives, habits, &c., in every-day life of those whom he has seen or known.

15. “This being so, it cannot be held that a native of India, by living three or four years in Europe, from the age of, say, 16 or 17 to 20 or 21, alone in a foreign country, and his entire time engaged in study for examinations, and without facilities for mixing in society, can in that short time get a sufficient knowledge of the inner, or even of the outer life of Englishmen, to enable him, on his return to India, to form, in a criminal trial of an Englishman, those inferences, above-mentioned as based on experience, equally correctly with an Englishman born and bred among his own countrymen, and therefore intimately acquainted with their social habits, religious and other feelings and ideas. He ventures to say that not even a Frenchman or a German, though of races much more nearly allied to the English in customs and feelings than any native of India, could be found who, even after years of intimacy with English life in England, would be regarded by Englishmen at home as, from this point of view, equally fitted with themselves to sit in judgment on Englishmen; and this would, he is convinced, hold good vice versa of any other civilised nation: for instance, a German or an Italian would be dissatisfied to have for his Judge in a criminal trial one of another European nationality, and that even though the foreigner might understand his language well and be quite competent in that respect; and in this connection one cannot fail to remember that the other nationalities of Europe have not allowed the Turkish Government to exercise jurisdiction over their subjects on Turkish soil;” while, as an illustrative phenomenon, he mentions the not unfrequent outcries in the English Press, caused by the exercise over Englishmen of the criminal jurisdiction of other European nations of those countries.

16. Mr. Waller assumes that he has shown that, for the reasons stated, an Englishman could not be said to have been given the best trial as regards agency which the Government could give him, if he were made over for trial in a criminal case to a native of India who had resided in England for some four or five years as above described, and who, for the reasons stated, was not equally qualified with an Englishman, by every-day experience of English men and women of the middle and lower classes, to decide in the trial whether he might (in the words of section 164 of the Evidence Act) presume the existence of any fact as likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of human conduct in its relation to the facts of the particular case.

The deduction therefore resulting is that the Government is bound in criminal trials to give Englishmen, where it is possible, an Englishman to try them, as being undeniably more qualified by knowledge of 'the common course of human conduct' among Englishmen, than those Native Civilians on whom it is proposed to confer jurisdiction to try European British subjects in the mofussil.

17. As regards the class of officers coming under clauses (b), (c), and (d), Mr. Waller remarks:—

"As to those Native Magistrates who have never been to England, and whose acquaintance with Englishmen and their ideas and habits are derived from the slight amount of intercourse they may have had with them in this country, of course the argument just formulated applies very much more strongly to show that Government would not be doing its duty towards Englishmen in providing the best agency, if it were to make them over to these Magistrates for trial in criminal cases.

"This incapacity of inexperience throws no slur on the moral or intellectual capacity of the Native Magistrate; and to make the former necessarily connected with the latter quality is entirely illogical and untrue.

"These gentlemen may be qualified to hold posts of high position and trust as executive or judicial officers, their moral and intellectual capacity may equal that of the most upright and able Englishmen, and yet the disqualification above indicated must exist. Unless, therefore, it be shewn that Government cannot provide English Judges for Englishmen in the mofussil, or cannot do so without causing serious administrative inconvenience, it is not a good policy to make law the measure proposed in the Bill.

18. Mr. Badshah, Assistant Magistrate of Goalundo, writes as follows:—

"Under the present law, administrative inconvenience is felt. I have been in charge of the Goalundo sub-division for nearly two years, but I have not the powers of a Justice of the Peace. Being stationed at an important railway terminus, European British-born subjects are often brought up before me. Unless they choose to waive their privilege they must be sent on to Furreedpore. This would cause serious inconvenience to them on account of the want of proper accommodation. The European vagrant is found everywhere; and unless the law on this subject is amended such people may terrorise to their heart's content over the people of the district where the Magistrate and Collector is a native. Besides this practical inconvenience, there is the complaint made by some of the Native Civilians that, on account of the anomalous character of the law, Government will doom them to serve in unhealthy places."

19. Mr. Badshah, however, goes on to say: "The case against Europeans in the mofussil are generally difficult to try. They require, on the part of the judicial officer, force of character, sound judgment, tact and discrimination. It is difficult for natives to enter into the ways and ideas of an European, to understand his feelings, his prejudices, and, if he is a non-official, his sublime ignorance of the native character and habits. Consequently it will be generally a difficult task for a Native Magistrate to distinguish between the different shades of an offence committed by an European."

20. On the whole Mr. Badshah thinks "that, in the interests of justice, the Bill should be withdrawn for some years at least. Nothing can be more pernicious—nothing more detrimental to the welfare of society—than to compel men to be tried by Judges whom the former will not trust. It will not only be rash, but disastrous to public policy to invest the latter with new powers. It will be rash because an experiment will be tried against the wishes of those who are most interested in the Bill, whose co-operation will be required to make it useful, and who will throw difficulties in the way of its success. It will be disastrous, because there will be a constant cavilling at the justice of the Native Judge. Every decision of his will be scrutinized, every judgment that he will pass will be ridiculed, every sentence that he will pronounce will be considered too harsh. Every newspaper correspondent will rush into print with his exaggerated tale of the horrors inflicted on the European British subject, and in passionate language will call upon the whole European community to rise in indignation against the Native Magistrate. The native papers will retaliate in the same violent manner. The sore will be kept open, justice will be degraded. What possible respect can men have for their Judges and their judgments, if the former are lampooned and the latter despised?

21. "The tendency of the lower class of natives is to think that sahibs are unjustly favoured when they are acquitted on good grounds. The impartiality of the Native Magistrate will be impeached by the Europeans, if in any case an European British subject is punished; it will be impeached by the Natives if he is let off. To equalize rights, to remove the irritation and friction which attend their inequality, is certainly high and noble policy. But if the privileges of a class are infinitesimal, if they injure no person and irritate a very small body of men, if their removal is associated with the degradation of justice, and tends to bring Judges into contempt, it is still higher policy to let alone the privileges, so that the sacred name of justice may not be sullied, nor Judges become the targets for universal ridicule and abuse. It has been the aim and object of every civilized nation to secure their Judges from attacks on their impartiality. I cannot suppose that the present Government of India, if they were informed of all the facts, would depart from the declared policy of the civilized world."

22. Baboo Okhoy Coomar Sen, my Personal Assistant, thinks that "there can be no doubt as to the soundness of the principle of the Bill. As Government is now administered in this country, the people, rightly or wrongly, look upon the District Magistrate as the representative of the executive power of Government in the district. He is the chief Magistrate, and is responsible for the preservation of peace and order in his district. To this end he is vested with powers to try on criminal charges all classes of the people in his district, of whatever creed or nationality, and it seems to me that in the interests of good government, he should continue to exercise such powers. A District Magistrate without such powers would be an anomaly. Not only would the classes lying beyond the pale of his jurisdiction, but even those within it, would naturally look down upon him; the former would consider themselves above his authority, and the latter would distrust him as one not in the confidence of Government, and not able to protect them from certain privileged classes." His position would be lowered in the eyes of both, and Baboo Okhoy Coomar Sen is afraid that, with half powers, a Native Magistrate would find it difficult to keep the peace in any district in which there might happen to be a number of Europeans of the lower orders. For these reasons, he ventures to think that the District Magistrate must, as now, have criminal jurisdiction over his European fellow-subjects, and that if an Indian Civilian be not fit to be entrusted with such jurisdiction, he should not be appointed to that high and responsible post at all.

23. By parity of reasoning, the Sessions Judge, of whatever creed or nationality, should have the same jurisdiction; one not fit to be entrusted with such powers should not be placed in that high position at all.

24. As to whether Local Governments should be empowered to appoint any covenanted civilian or any member of the Native Civil Service, constituted under the Statute 33 Victoria, Cap. 3, he believes it is only fair to the wise and experienced heads of Local Governments that they should have such powers, which they are sure to exercise with great caution and judgment. They are responsible for the good government of the country entrusted to them, and should have all the necessary powers to that end. A member of the Native Civil Service would probably be made a Justice of the Peace only when a covenanted European civilian was not available, or when he had, by especially meritorious services, gained the confidence of the Local Government.

25. With regard to the question whether any administrative inconvenience arises, or is likely to arise, in the future from the exclusion of the native covenanted civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges, he states that, to his knowledge, no case of inconvenience has yet arisen in this division, or indeed in any district in which he has served; but he apprehends that, as more and more native gentlemen are appointed to high posts in the mofussil, such are not unlikely to occur in the future.

26. Mr. Paul, the Magistrate of Dacca, writes, as follows:—

"I object to the Bill as being unnecessary and uncalled for on the grounds of administrative inconvenience, as calculated to widen the breach between Natives and Europeans (non-officials), and as wanting in finality.

"I further object to it as depriving Englishmen of their most cherished right of being tried by their peers, by men who can feel for them and can understand them, and as exposing them, in isolated and distant spots particularly, to the danger of ruin through conspiracy and false charges.

27. "The Magistrate of a district, as a general matter of fact, seldom if ever tries a criminal case; consequently any possible difficulty that can be anticipated could be easily met by the appointment in such cases of an European Joint-Magistrate, who might well be chosen from the judicial branch, so as to leave no possibility of insinuation of rivalry between Magistrate and Joint.

"Besides this, owing to the increased and increasing facilities for communication, more particularly in those districts into which European enterprise has chiefly penetrated, there would, in case of necessity, be no difficulty in sending a special officer, such as is often done for natives themselves—vide, for example, the great Tikkari case.

"The present Bill would be more likely to cause inconvenience through disqualifying European Deputy Magistrates, as so forcibly pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Thomas; while, if this error has to be corrected, we again open the door to further agitation to invest all classes, covenanted and uncovenanted alike, with jurisdiction over Europeans.

"That the proposed change is likely to widen the breach between Europeans and Natives is obvious from the agitation that is setting in on both sides, and the violent accusations, brought by each. From my own long experience in dealing with tea-planters, and also indigo-planters, I greatly fear the consequences that may ensue from setting a native in judgment over such persons. Whether rightly or wrongly it matters not, but the fact remains that Europeans in this country do not trust in the impartial administration of justice by natives (that even natives have no implicit faith in their native courts is curiously illustrated at this present moment in this very district, where I have received quite recently affidavits accusing no less than three of my senior native deputies of partiality, and begging for transfer of cases from their file); and unless there is trust, administration cannot proceed smoothly. A slight error or excess in exercising these powers by a native magistrate (and such mistakes are inevitable even with the best) might lead to open violence and resistance, the consequences of which would be most deplorable, and the final effect of which cannot easily be foreseen."

28. "If in the Bill it had been proposed to confer these powers on native civilians alone [class (a)], I could have understood the arguments adduced in favour thereof, and would not so vehemently have opposed the measure, but have contented myself with merely pointing out that, for the sake of the sentiments of so very few, it were impolitic and unnecessary to raise such a dangerous and burning question. I would at once have acknowledged that these few Anglicised civilians, isolated from the bulk of their countrymen, would be more than ordinarily careful not to let race prejudice or race connections carry them away, while, added to this, their long sojourn in England must have given them some insight into European ways, and opened their eyes to the motives and principles that underlie English social life and customs. I would have admitted that there was some logic in arguing that men who, though of different race, creed and clime, have gone through the same educational course, have passed the same educational tests, and have to a certain extent foregathered with their European comrades are capable of exercising the same powers and bearing the same responsibilities as their European colleagues. But such reasoning cannot be applied to the other classes this Bill proposes to include. If these latter are judged fit to try Europeans, under what disqualification does an old, experienced, and tried Deputy Magistrate labour as regards any distinction between them? Both are Government nominees; in neither class is there any provision that they shall have had an European education; and as a fact there is nothing to prevent an uncovenanted deputy, with interest, from being promoted into the ranks of the covenanted, on whom this Bill proposes to confer exceptional powers. It follows that if this Bill is passed, Government will not be able to stop at the covenanted services, but will be carried on to sweep away what little privileges and safeguards the European retains."

29. Mr. Sharp, Magistrate of Furreedpore, was also asked for his opinion, but he has not up to date sent it to me; and as an urgent telegram asking for the submission of the report has to-day been received from Government, I cannot delay the report to admit of his opinion being considered.

No. 349G., dated 6th May, 1883.

From—F. M. HALLIDAY, Esq., Commissioner of the Patna Division,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

With reference to your letter No. 1518J, dated 27th March last, on the subject of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I have the honour to submit the following, after consultation with the district officers of my division, and the subordinate officers, European and Native. I have also had the advantage of receiving the opinions of several European and native non-official gentlemen who have been consulted by the district officers.

2. With some few exceptions on the side of the native officers opinions vary with their nationality, the native being in favour of the Bill, and the Englishman against it. As might be anticipated from the public discussion that has ensued on the introduction of the proposed measure, this as a fair representation of the general division of sentiment on the subject, all Europeans being violently opposed to the change, and almost all natives here giving to it what is in fact a languid support. From the Magistrate of Patna I learn that the gentlemen consulted, official and non-official, Europeans and natives, are, to a man, unanimous in considering the Bill unnecessary, and (with one exception) in condemning it. My own personal enquiries show me that Patna native opinion is quite indifferent on the matter.

3. An expression of opinion has been asked for on the three points—

I.—The principle of the Bill.

II.—The administrative inconvenience at present arising from the exclusion of native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects.

III.—Such administrative inconvenience being likely to arise in the future.

4. Taking the principle of the Bill, I would urge with all earnestness that neither in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, nor in the draft of the Bill, nor in the arguments adduced in the discussion of the Bill on its introduction by its advocates, has any consistency of principle been successfully demonstrated.

It has been aptly pointed out to me by the Magistrate of Durbhanga that both advocates and opponents of the Bill call its principle abolition of distinction between natives and Englishmen. Opponents, in fear, call it the thin end of the wedge: advocates, in hope, call it an instalment of justice. In the discussions in Council, the Bill was said to have no principle; it was not the thin end of the wedge, nor an instalment of justice. It had no tendencies nor object beyond itself; it was merely a Bill to equalize native Civilians' powers inside and out of Calcutta. The introducer of the Bill stated it had a principle—to remove from the Code judicial disqualification arising from race. In the words of the Statement of Objects and Reasons, "to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely upon race." Now, in legislation, it is simply impossible, with the smallest degree of honesty, to promise finality, and in this Bill such a promise as that insinuated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons is not supported by its conditions, for any one who approves of the provisions cannot fail to see much more of the same kind at hand to be done.

The Magistrate of Shahabad rightly draws attention to the fact that the Bill itself cannot be said to accomplish the object set forth, and indeed it merely makes a pretence of attempting to deal with a part of the subject. It leaves untouched the right of the Englishman to be tried in all serious cases by a jury the majority of whom must consist of his countrymen. Thus race is still to be a judicial disqualification for deciding on the innocence or guilt of an European British subject. The other judicial privileges of Englishmen are left intact by the Bill,—as the right to be tried by a court of higher grade than that which deals with the offences of natives, and the right of appeal in every case. As Mr. Nolan has remarked, "the law, as it will stand when modified by the Bill, will still bristle with race distinctions," so that the whole position of a native with regard to criminal courts will remain, as it now is, inferior to that of Englishmen. The Bill declares natives to be capable of exercising jurisdiction over Europeans, but it provides that they must be natives of certain services, selected merely because they contain very few natives.

The bulk of the native magistracy is in the Uncovenanted Service, but this is carefully excluded from the field out of which the Executive Government may select the future Justices of the Peace; and why? Because it is native, and for no other reason. Cantonment Magistrates, Statutory Civilians and Members of the Non-Regulation Commission, have not, as a body, a better education than the Deputy Magistrates, and their legal training is very inferior to that of the senior members of the service to which the latter belong. Clearly, then, it is not on account of superior intelligence or judicial ability, that they are selected, while the men bearing high university degrees—some of the members, or former members, of the Bengal Legislative Council, who form the first rank of the Uncovenanted Service,—are excluded.

The only reason which can be assigned for the distinction is that of race. At present Cantonment Magistrates and members of the Non-Regulation Commission are Europeans, while Statutory Civilians have been affiliated to an European service. Thus even in the selection of Judges and Justices of the Peace, the one point with which the Bill professes to deal—the object of abolishing race distinction—race distinctions regulate the Bill. Concurring with the Magistrate of Shahabad, I am of opinion that it is an egregious mistake to raise this most invidious question, if it is not to be settled. The Bill, far from effecting such a settlement, would only shift the superstructure of European privilege to a new and hollow basis. Whether there is a justifiable need for such a settlement of the question, I shall remark upon further on.

5. Again, it has been explained by the introducer of the Bill that European cases are difficult, and therefore should be reserved for the higher courts. My own experience, and that of all my officers, confirms the well-known acceptance that the majority of European cases are exceptionally easy; but if they were difficult, this would not of itself induce the legislature to reserve them for the higher courts, and the courts for which they are to be reserved, as those of Cantonment Magistrates are not higher. The most difficult classes of cases are perjury, libel, concealment of birth, adultery, wounding religious feelings; and these offences are triable by Deputy Magistrates who, under the Bill, would be excluded from being allowed to decide, on his own confession, that a European soldier was drunk and disorderly. The anomaly is striking on the face of it, and the position assumed by the Bill cannot be defended. If it cannot be defended, the position cannot be long maintained; and I fully agree with my district officers in thinking that if such indefensible ground is to be occupied, we may look forward to a long period of agitation, such as that through which we are now passing. It is manifestly impossible that the Bill, if passed, can be maintained without giving rise to propositions for various further amendments, embodying the real principle sought, viz., abolition of distinction between Englishmen and natives. Indeed, I observe now from the public prints that from the native partisans of the proposed measure, a further pressure of the thin end of the wedge has been already applied, by the suggestion of an amendment to the present Bill, with reference to the disqualification therein of all Uncovenanted Europeans, other than such as may be Assistant Commissioners or Cantonment Magistrates; that jurisdiction over European British subjects should be given to all Deputy Magistrates, whether European or native, with first class powers.

6. I heartily agree with my most experienced district officers, and I would press the opinions upon the Government for the most serious consideration, that the proposals embodied in the Bill are politically disastrous, and calculated, both from an economical and social point of view, to work irremediable mischief. The ultimate object which must be of a certainty pressed upon us in all consistency, should the present Bill be passed, is the principle, as I have said above, of total abolition of distinction between Englishmen and natives, and this principle cannot be followed without destruction to the Empire.

7. In dealing with this part of the subject, I beg to submit the views of Mr. Boxwell, the Magistrate of Durbhunga, with which I concur entirely. He points out that at the outset we must discriminate between this principle of the abolition of the distinction between Englishmen and natives, and another principle with which a Bombay advocate for the Bill has confounded it. He supports the Bill because he approves of the association of natives in the administration. These two principles seem to be exactly the right and the wrong lines of direction. The Indian Empire is a military despotism, tempered by liberal ideas from England. Popular government of the Empire is impossible, and the idea is absurd; stated nakedly, no one entertains it, but some men, in their treatment of certain questions, seem to postulate it. The Continent of Europe will have a popular government ages before the Continent of India. The government of the Empire is not Bengali nor Hindustani, nor composite, but British. The Empire is held together solely by British supremacy, and a declaration of equality between the British and the natives would be nonsense. The Army furnishes the clearest and simplest illustrations. The Army in India is the backbone of the Government, and what would be the fate of any proposal to equalize Englishmen and natives in military matters? To equalize commands or arms, as by distribution of forts or artillery? The fact is that as long as, and because, we have the British Army at our back, almost any experiment in mixed administration may be tried.

The mischief is that in peace this foundation of the British rule is dropped out of sight, and wild things are said by native lawyers and orators about equality. What is the meaning of abolishing little distinctions, and doing away with little anomalies, while we keep 70,000 British soldiers holding the Empire, and paid by it for doing so? The fundamental principle of the British Empire in India is race distinction between the British who hold it and the nations who constitute it.

8. But the whole question in this phase has been so thoroughly advocated and discussed in the public prints, that I hesitate to add to the discussion. It has been most truly represented in a recent paper I have seen, containing arguments against the measure, that if the principle embodied therein is supported by arguments based on the so-called anomalous character of the present law, all such anomalies, if such they be, must remain as inseparable constituents of the paramount anomaly of all, namely, the existence, in fact, of the supremacy of British rule in India. In the face of this anomaly, there is no special or unreasonable anomaly in the existence of the right which the proposed measure seeks to take away.

It is not difficult to understand that the other principle mentioned above, viz., association of natives in the administration, is of almost equal rank, and practically as important. We must make all possible use of the natives, both for the sake of the work they can do, and for the sake of giving them work. The more numerous, lucrative, and honourable careers are open to them, the better for every one, and for the Empire. But acts done on this right principle are by thoughtless people supposed to be done on the other wrong and impossible principle. Mr. Boxwell forcibly puts it in this way: a Bengali might liken Baboo Kristo Dass Pal to Mr. Bright; but Mr. Bright sat in Parliament because the people sent him there, and in the Ministry, because Parliament sent him and his party to govern; whereas the Baboo sits in the Viceregal Council because the Viceroy chooses to listen to his advice and take it or not, as he pleases. I would note that the introducer of the Bill speaks of a disqualification; but the word is unmeaning in this place. It pre-supposes something of a claim or right to office and equality, but nothing of the kind exists, or can exist. There is no right, inherent or conferred, in the appointment of a native to the Civil Service, which has been wrongfully invaded. The so-called disqualification is not a disqualification of the Judge, but a privilege of the European, which he claims as a long inherent right; and as it has been very aptly stated in the general public discussion of the measure, it would be as reasonable to speak of the privilege of Europeans to demand a jury composed of one-half or more of Europeans, as a disqualification of native jurors.

10. One of the arguments put forward in earnest in support of the Bill is that it involves loss of dignity to a native Civilian to be barred from trying any class of subjects of the Empire. The argument really deserves no consideration. The desire of a native Civilian to be able to try an Englishman is no more commendable than would be in an English Magistrate to see a privileged Rajah in his witness-box in court. It would be much more reasonable to withdraw from a Rajah the privilege conferred, and always held so dear by him, of exemption from appearance in court, than to withdraw the privilege from Europeans, which the present Bill would do.

11. I am reminded by the Magistrate of Chumparun, Mr. Henry, that it is not contended in favour of the proposed amendment of the law that there has been any practical failure of justice since the passing of Act X of 1872, owing to the non-concession to certain native officers of criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. As there has been no practical failure of justice, it becomes necessary to consider who are the persons that will gain relief by the proposed alteration of the law, and what title they have to claim this relief.

From all that has passed, and has been written, regarding this measure for the last two months, it may be assumed that application for relief is not the outcome of national sentiment, nor does the demand for it emanate from the people, or from any considerable number of the people. It comes from a very small section of the community in Bengal, and a still smaller in Behar, who are totally unable to show on what grounds they claim relief, except upon the general and not intelligible ground that there is an anomaly to be removed, and that the proposed measure, if passed into law, would make the Criminal Code more symmetrical from a lawyer's point of view. While the Bill, then, confers no benefit on any class of people (unless the attempt to meet the wishes of a few native officials be considered a benefit), it causes the greatest pain, consternation and exasperation to the whole European community, and will end by alienating them altogether, without conciliating the natives.

Notwithstanding the remarks which have been made in Council as to the position which the Government should assume in this question, to meet the so-called attempt of the European community to force the resignation of their Bill, it seems to me that the attitude, feelings, and representations of such community pressed with such honesty of purpose, is not a matter to be lightly treated, but is one requiring the gravest consideration. It would, I think, be folly to blind one's self to the obvious fact that those opposed to the Bill—that is, the Europeans—have the power to embarrass the Government in India, though the wish to do so may be, and no doubt is, very remote; but while the agitation continues, it will do harm, even more than has already admittedly arisen.

12. I think it right to submit to Government the following opinion received from an English gentleman, a Barrister of Patna, having a large experience of the natives, as showing what native opinion among the people has arrived at, with those who have given the matter any consideration. It may be urged that this sort of opinion is only the outcome of native ignorance, and is worthless; but under the peculiar conditions of our rule in India, I am not at all prepared to admit that such expressions of opinion on the action of the Government can, with any wisdom, be totally disregarded. The following is an extract of the remarks above-mentioned:—"Again, the Bill is nothing more or less than a concession to the clamour of natives. But a concession is never regarded as a grant by a semi-civilized man, but a surrender or a retreat, and so the present Bill is regarded in that light already. The idea prevailing in the bazars is that the Raj of the Angriz is gone, that is, the Sirkar, an undefined and unseen power, has taken from the Angriz a privilege which gave them power over the Hindus, and consequently now they are all equal. The bad effects of such an idea prevailing amongst the general populace can be conceived, and I apprehend that the passing of the Bill will but strengthen and confirm the erroneous impressions of the people, and will tend to render administration more difficult, and will jeopardise the safety of isolated Europeans."

13. Taking the case from the side of the accused Englishman, there is something more to be said than the argument about his right to be tried by his peers, in which, I am bound to say, I am inclined to think a good deal of nonsense has been talked. On the question of the general qualifications or the individual merit of selected native officers for exercising the jurisdiction proposed by the Bill, I do not wish to touch. Though several of my officers have dwelt on this point, it seems to me a secondary consideration, for it matters little whether the native civilian be, from his birth, education, and habits of thought, qualified or not qualified for the purpose intended, if it be once conceded that the real principle of the Bill is to be adopted—in that the total abolition of distinction between Englishmen and natives is accepted, and the long inherent privilege of the Englishman is swept away.

14. There is, I think, much to be considered in the argument put before me, that, on the whole, it is difficult to conceive any but an Englishman could properly restrain and keep in order a violent and lawless Englishman. Our estimate and the native estimate of crimes of violence and chicanery are different. Mr. Boxwell, the Magistrate of Durbhunga, has rightly put it in saying that we are determined that our views shall prevail. We are strong enough to keep our countrymen in check, and determined not to let the natives reply by false accusations, and we assert that the natives are not strong enough to do this. Therefore we say, for the good and for the safety of both natives and Englishmen, leave accused Englishmen to be dealt with by Englishmen. The motive of the Bill, as set forth by the introducer, looks like an inversion of reason. As Mr. Boxwell expresses it, "there is a big thing of wide-reaching importance—justice between Englishmen and natives; and there is a little thing of no importance—the fancy of a Judge for an increase of dignity. The Bill proposes to let the little frivolity determine the great matter of justice."

15. In concluding upon this portion of the subject, I cannot do better than submit the following remarks in quotation from the views submitted by the Magistrate of Durbhunga. He says—"The coincidence of the Bill for Local Self-Government throws light on the question. The title of that Bill is a misnomer, and for this reason the scheme has a chance of success. The Government hands over for administration by local bodies certain departments of work, with responsibilities and funds. These departments are no more Government, than a railway company or a school or a ship is Government. But the title of the Bill—Local Self-Government—and the reasons for the present Bill—removal of disabilities or disqualifications, together with the license permitted to both English and native newspapers, and the mildness of the despotism generally—all unite to create a false idea that the Government of the Indian Empire is something other than a British despotism. I think the only very bad thing about the Bill is its principle. If it had been introduced as an administrative necessity, and anything like a necessity had been shown for it, then it would have been taken like other disagreeable necessities. But as it is plain that the British Empire, containing many natives of almost every degree of civilization, from savages upwards, counting its languages by scores and its subjects by hundreds of millions, must be governed as a despotism, it seems absurd to base administrative reform on any principle of equality or abolition of disqualification, or other outcome of the growth of popular Government.

"It is certain that the issues here raised are real and not imaginary. The men who want the Bill are a few English-trained natives of Bengal and Behar; and they want it, not for any improvement in justice, but as an admission of a claim to equality. I say the claim to equality cannot be listened to, even to reject. It is irrelevant to every question. Englishmen do not claim individual superiority. We are the subjects of the despotism as much as our native comrades. The Government takes all the advice it thinks needful, and appoints each man to his appropriate work. This notion of equality has been picked up from English books. Bengalis grant no equality to Sonthals, Hindustanis grant none to Bengalis, Brahmins grant none to other castes. Nor does any one think about such a thing, except a few English-dressed natives who grasp a small part of an idea."

16. Taking the second and third heads of the question, as to the administrative inconvenience at present and in the future, I concur in the unanimous opinion of all the officers of the Division, that no inconvenience exists or is likely to exist. I am of opinion that the administrative difficulties anticipated are altogether visionary, and I assert this with the full experience of the administration of a Division having a particularly large community of European residents, the number of which has been recently computed at some 2,300. I would call attention to the fact—a significant one—that the Bill itself, and I refer particularly to the Statement of Objects and Reasons, makes no mention of “administrative inconveniences.”

It seems now to be put forward by the supporters of the measure. I have before me the opinion of another English Barrister of Patna, who emphatically adds his testimony to those who are against the change contemplated, after more than eight years’ residence in the mofussil, where he has, during the whole period, practised uninterruptedly in his profession in the province of Behar. This gentleman has stated that in his experience, since the promotion of the Indigo Planters’ Association, the number of criminal charges brought against planters are few, that the most serious ones are found false, that no case has been found so serious as to necessitate a trial before the local sessions court.

Other classes affected by the contemplated change would be zemindars, European managers of native estates, railway employes, including contractors on railway works, merchants, and shop-keepers. At present no inconvenience in the administration of justice is felt in dealing with any of the classes mentioned. Taking the district of Chumparun as a typical district, where there is a large European population, and where some idea of the value of the capital sunk in one industry alone, over which the Europeans have control, may be formed from the fact that the Chumparun indigo sold during the season of 1881-82 realised over 55 lakhs of rupees, the figures of European crime for the last five years show 19 cases. The Magistrate has reported to me that in seven of these cases the complaint was either rejected or the defendant discharged. Six of the remaining 12 cases were cases of assault or causing hurt; three more cases came under section 506, Indian Penal Code (criminal intimidation), and were compromised out of court. There was one case of criminal trespass (compromised), one case of wrongful confinement, and one case of wrongful restraint. Thus, during a period of five years, 19 complaints were preferred against Europeans.

Seven of these cases, on inquiry, were found to be groundless, and of the remaining 12, 11 were petty offences against the person, with one case of criminal trespass. Had there been no European judicial officers in the district, no appreciable inconvenience could have been experienced, even if, during the course of five years, it had been necessary to bring in officers from neighbouring districts to deal with, on the average, something less than four cases during a year. It appears, moreover, that during the years 1878, 1879, and 1880, there were in all only five cases, one of which was dismissed, and three of which were simultaneously instituted against one accused, and compromised out of court. It may be asserted, therefore, that so far as the experience of the last five years can guide us, the state of European crime in the district has been such that no possible inconvenience could have been experienced in dealing with it, if the whole district judiciary had laboured under the disability of not being able to try European British subjects.

17. Turning to the list of the Covenanted Civil Service, I find that since 1870, namely, during the last 13 years, there have been appointed to the Covenanted Civil Service in Lower Bengal, by open competition in England and by appointment without competition in India, 13 gentlemen who are not European British subjects. Thus, the entrances into the Service have been at the rate of one a year. This, moreover, is the average that will probably be maintained for some time to come, as the average number of appointments has not exceeded eight a year, and the proportion of natives of India is not to exceed one-sixth of the total number. Experience has shown that covenanted civilians in these provinces rarely begin to act for short periods as Magistrate-Collector or Judges before 10 to 12 years, while it takes much longer to attain the substantive rank of either Magistrate-Collector or Judge. Thus, during the next 10 years not more than 13 native covenanted civilians will have to be provided for. Of these about five or six will probably select the Judicial line, while seven or eight will probably select the executive line. With regard to those who select the Executive line, it has long been held that it is not the function of the District Magistrate to try criminal cases, and as a fact he very rarely does try such cases. Important criminal cases are almost invariably tried exclusively by the Joint-Magistrate or senior covenanted or uncovenanted assistant at head-quarters. Districts in which an experienced Subordinate European Magistrate is not ordinarily stationed are at the same time districts in which Europeans are rarely met with, and these may therefore be left out of the question. There are 46 districts in Lower Bengal. When, therefore, these seven or eight Native Civilians, in the course of the next ten years, rise to the rank of Magistrate-Collector, there will be practically no difficulty whatever in posting them to districts containing an experienced European Assistant, or in providing them with one from the large number that are constantly returning from leave or seeking a transfer. During the next ten years, therefore, the administrative inconvenience will be infinitesimal.

After 20 years the case will be much the same. Let us suppose that the full proportion of one-sixth has then been attained, and that out of 46 districts, one-sixth i.e., seven or eight districts, are administered by natives; we thus obtain the very same situation that has just been considered. It must therefore be admitted that as long as the proportion of Native to European Covenanted Civilians does not exceed one-sixth, so long will any administrative difficulty, as regards the executive branch of the Service, be practically unfelt.

To take now the Judicial branch of the service: there are fewer judicial than executive appointments, and in consequence fewer Civilians select the Judicial branch of the Service. At the end of the years not more than five or six Native Civilians are likely to be occupying the post of District Judge. There are 30 Judgeships in Lower Bengal, including Chota Nagpore: one-sixth of 30 is five; so that at no time may we expect to find more than five or six Native District Judges in Lower Bengal. Now the number of cases in which Europeans appear as accused persons in the mofussil is, as I have endeavoured to show above, admittedly small; but instances of Europeans being committed to the Sessions Courts for trial are extremely rare.

Perhaps these five Native Judges might have between them one such case in a year. If, in the exceedingly rare case of an European being committed to the Sessions Court for trial, the Sessions Judge should happen to be a native of India, the inconvenience of transferring such a case to a neighbouring district for trial will be practically unfelt. In the matter of appeals it is much the same. In the rare cases in which Europeans appeal from decisions given by European Magistrates, there would be practically no inconvenience in having such appeals decided in a neighbouring district. Appeals are usually decided on the record; and it may be assumed, from present public opinion, that an European would infinitely prefer incurring the expense of prosecuting his appeal in a neighbouring district, rather than have his appeal decided by a native tribunal. I think, therefore, we need not hesitate to dismiss as practically non-existent the alleged administrative inconvenience in the Judicial branch of the Service also. In Behar especially, so far as my division of Patna is concerned, the extensive railways all over the Division, the almost perfect means of communication opened out everywhere, both by road and river, have made every place in each district easily accessible, so that I cannot conceive a single instance where "administrative inconvenience" would ensue, when it was found necessary to transfer a case on account of defect in jurisdiction.

18. Considering this question in another phase, I am reminded that the direct effect of the proposed legislation would be to diminish considerably the total number of officers competent to try Europeans; for while there is to be no increase in the numerical strength of the Covenanted Civil Service, from which body alone Justices of the Peace are hereafter to be selected, the proposed Bill does not empower local Governments to appoint to this office members of the Military or Uncovenanted Services, or of the non-official community, even to fill up the vacancies caused by the retirement of the uncovenanted officers and others who are now Justices of the Peace.

The result brought about will be that the number of Justices of the Peace cannot exceed the numerical strength of the Covenanted Civil Service. How great this reduction in numbers will be may be inferred from the fact that, exclusive of military officers and non-officials, there are at present 40 Deputy Magistrates who are Justices of the Peace. It is obviously convenient that European Deputy Magistrates should be Justices of the Peace when in charge of sub-divisions, or at head-quarters of districts filled with Europeans; and the only reason to the contrary can only be the fear of making a distinction between them and Native Deputy Magistrates. The Magistrate of Shahabad points out particularly to me the inconvenience in the adoption of the Bill, from an administrative point of view, in the case of Sessions Judges. A native would preside over the court, while the majority of the jury, in a case where an European was the accused, would be Europeans. Speaking as responsible for the due prosecution of such, I should regard such a mixed tribunal as the most unfavourable for the ends of justice, as long as the Europeans retain present opinions. The jury would distrust the Judge—a state of feeling pregnant with administrative inconvenience. Justices of the Peace act without juries in trying Europeans for offences which in England would be cognizable by juries; they have a difficult and invidious task to perform, even when the presiding officer commands the respect of the community. If natives summarily condemn Europeans without the verdict of juries, we may apprehend considerable administrative difficulties, particularly when the accused are soldiers, and the offences charged are not of a kind to alienate the sympathy of their comrades.

Mr. Nolan in Shahabad, speaking from the experience of something of the relations between a regiment on the line of march and a Native Civilian in charge of the Sasseram sub-division, says, with much force I think, that he has no doubt that, if an affray had occurred between ryots and soldiers as to the collection of supplies, and the Native Civilian had attempted to try the European soldiers, the result would not have been all that could be wished.

19. In conclusion, I beg to say that the opinions I have submitted above embody a verdict against the proposed Bill, as being eminently impolitic and absolutely uncalled for, given by every one of the seven district officers of my division without exception.

submit, for the information of the Government of India, copies of letters* from the Commissioners of the Burdwan and Presidency Divisions, reporting on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

From—JOHN BEAMES, Esq., Commissioner of the Burdwan Division,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

I have the honor to reply to your No. 1518J., dated 27th March last, calling for my opinion on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure.

2. All the European officers whom I have consulted are unanimously of opinion that the principle of the Bill is absolutely indefensible, and that no inconvenience has ever arisen from the present state of the law. I am also of this opinion.

3. As regards any inconvenience that might theoretically be assumed to result from the inability of certain native officers to try European British subjects on criminal charges, the experience of myself and the district officers of this division must, I think, be held to have peculiar weight. Here, if anywhere, such inconvenience, if it ever existed, would have shown itself unmistakably.

4. The Burdwan Division, comprising the whole of Western Bengal, contains the populous and important town of Howrah, with a larger population of British inhabitants than any place in Bengal outside of Calcutta. It also contains the large railway depôts of Raneegunge, Assensole, and Rampore Hât, the population of which is principally European, as well as 225 miles of railway along which trains worked by Europeans are constantly passing. In and around Serampore, there is also a considerable European population, and there are numerous Europeans engaged in the silk and indigo industries in Midnapore and Bankoora, and employed on steamers and in engineering works on the rivers and canals.

5. Several of the Native Civilians who were appointed in England, and several of those appointed under the Statute in India, have also served, or are still serving in this division.

6. In spite, however, of all these conditions having existed for several years past, there has never been the slightest difficulty in bringing Europeans to trial. On the rare occasions when there has been no European Magistrate at Raneegunge, it has been found perfectly practicable either to bring the accused by rail to Burdwan, a journey of only two hours, or the Magistrate of Burdwan has been able, without any inconvenience, to go to Raneegunge to try him. Similarly, it has always been found easy to provide for the trial of railway servants in the case of accidents occurring on the line in the Howrah and Hooghly districts. In petty cases, such as drunkenness, Europeans have invariably shown themselves very reasonable, and have waived their right to be tried by an European Magistrate, rather than delay the disposal of their case.

7. There is no undue obstructiveness on the part of Europeans in such petty matters, and there is consequently not the shadow of a reason for supposing that, under the present constitution of the Judicial Services, the changes contemplated by the Bill are in any way necessary.

8. Even if, however, any such reason did exist when the Bill was first introduced, the events that have occurred since then are so serious, and the state of feeling excited by it is so grave and so suggestive of grounds for anxiety in the future, as to outweigh any considerations that may have seemed forcible to those who introduced it. Only a few months have elapsed since the Bill first made its appearance; but already we, who live among the people and have the best possible opportunities of gauging public opinion, tremble for the results that must ensue if it becomes law.

9. In common with all right-thinking men, I deeply regret and disapprove of the intemperate language used by Englishmen at public meetings, and it is with equal disapproval that I have read the scurrilous and offensive articles that have appeared in native newspapers. Serious men on both sides, I am well aware, deplore these ebullitions of bad taste and bad feeling; but unfortunately political contests cannot be fought out by serious men alone; there must always be excitable and irrepressible followers on either side, who embitter the discussion by personalities, and sometimes render reconciliation impossible.

10. I see only too much reason to fear that the animosity and ill-feeling that has been roused by this Bill will not soon die out. Bengalees will not soon forget the scathing contempt shewn towards them by Englishmen, nor will the latter forget or forgive the insulting taunts of the native papers. So much of evil has this Bill already worked, and it seems probable that these sentiments will deepen into a permanent antagonism of race against race, which will seriously injure the Government and retard the development of the country.

11. Before this agitation began, the relations between the Englishman and the Bengalee, as far as my extensive experience goes, were on the whole very friendly. The Englishman believed, as he always has, and always will, in his own personal superiority and in the superiority of his race, but he readily admitted the intellectual ability and other good qualities of the Bengalee. We indulged, perhaps, among ourselves in a little good-natured satire on certain features in the habits and manners of the Baboo, which seemed to us ludicrous; and he, on his side, I doubt not, laughed behind our backs at some of our eccentricities. But the two races lived together on very friendly terms, and there were frequent instances of acts of kindness done by one to the other. A very overwhelming majority of the native population were quite contented to take an attitude of inferiority to Europeans generally. The acuteness which is one of their strongest characteristics led them to see that more was to be got by approaching the proud Englishman humbly and by flattering his vanity than by opposing him and striving to wring concessions from him by force.

12. But there has been growing up of late years a class of natives who, though numerically few, have become, by their extravagant pretensions and excessive self-conceit, by their unreasonable and unsatisfied longing for power, and by their morbid discontent and disloyalty, a serious danger to the stability of our rule in India. It is we who have created these men, and we have now to fear lest, as the poet writes, "we perish by this people we have made." If we perished, the Bengalee would not hold his own country long; he would be conquered and enslaved by manlier races, and the country would relapse into the chaos from which we rescued it little more than a century ago.

13. It may be thought that I am letting my forebodings carry me too far. I can only say that I am expressing, as faithfully as I can, the impressions formed by long years of residence among and intimacy with the people. It is true this present Bill may be but a small thing, and some people may wonder at its giving rise to so much agitation. But it is generally some very small thing that sets kingdoms in a blaze, especially if it has been led up to by a course of action which has caused much smouldering discontent.

14. The Stamp Act of 1776 was in itself a small thing, but it led to the revolt of all the American colonies, and their permanent severance from the British Crown. If, as is hinted, this present Bill is only put forward to pave the way for wider measures by which the majority of posts in the administration of this country are to be held by natives, then this Bill may have consequences as far reaching as the Stamp Act, and far more disastrous.

15. Of the three classes to be considered in relation to this Bill, I will take first the Englishman (by which I mean the European British subject). The Englishman would not have been so much excited about this present Bill had it not been the last of a series of measures which he has for some time watched with unconcealed annoyance. The admission of natives to the Covenanted Civil Service and to the Bench of the High Court were both very unpopular measures with Europeans of all classes. Then came the so-called statutory Civilians, whose creation was felt to be a direct and bitter insult to the English Covenanted Civil Service. While a young Englishman of good birth, who has lived from his childhood in an atmosphere of the highest civilization that the world has yet attained, has been educated at an English public school and university, and has gone through a period of special training besides, is first subjected to a severe competitive examination, then to two years' further training in England, followed by a second examination, before he is allowed even to enter the Civil Service, a young Native gentleman, who has had none of this training, who is often very imperfectly educated, and whose childhood has been subjected to the far from elevating influences of native society, is considered fit to be admitted to the Service at once, and without any preliminary test of his qualifications. It is impossible to imagine what justification there can be for such an amazing anomaly as this.

16. All these things have been felt very bitterly by Englishmen, and there has been added of late years the very great difficulty which Europeans settled in India have found in providing for their children. One department of Government after another has been closed to all but Asiatics; and even when not absolutely closed, the preference shewn for these latter has been so marked, that a man of European birth has had no chance of employment. The Roorkee Resolution was the last of this series of measures by which men of the ruling race have been excluded from rule, or even from subordinate employment.

17. In its laudable anxiety to do as much as possible for its Asiatic subjects, Government seems to have forgotten that it had a large number of European and Eurasian subjects also whose claim upon it was at least as great as that of Asiatics.

18. Consequently the outcry against this Bill must be regarded as the explosion at least of long pent-up discontent. I am sure that the wiser and more thoughtful among us do not for an instance begrudge the native his share in the posts at the disposal of Government: we only claim for our countrymen our share also. Many of us, among whom I may be reckoned, though sincere well-wishers to the natives of this country, which we have spent the best years of our lives in serving, think that the native as a rule has not yet reached that pitch of development at which he is fitted for high appointments. I think they are fitter for judicial than executive work; but certainly, in the latter line, I have never seen any native who was, in my estimation, fit to be anything higher than a Deputy Collector. As second in command, a native is admirable, but as first he is utterly deficient.

19. All the feelings which I alluded to above will be much intensified if natives are allowed to try Europeans on criminal charges. It is galling enough to my countrymen to have natives placed on a level with themselves. It is worse still when a native is admitted without test to posts which the European can only obtain by repeated trials and severe examinations. It is worse still to have one's children excluded from posts under Government, while natives are admitted, even if acknowledged to be inferior. But it is indeed the last straw when the Englishman, already placed at so great a disadvantage in the struggle for existence, is liable to be tried as a criminal by native Magistrates.

20. For it can hardly seriously be contended that a man brought up in a Bengalee village or town, receiving all the education he can boast of at a zillah school and a Calcutta college, can become perfectly acquainted with English ideas and tones of thought, and with the motives that actuate English men and women, by a residence of two or three years in London.

21. I remember hearing about one of these gentlemen who had spent three years in England, and was asked what he thought of our country. His answer was: "I really know nothing whatever about it. I spent all my time in a room at Nottingham studying, and

I know no more of England than I could learn in my daily walk from my lodgings to the lecture-room."

22. This is one of the men whom the Honourable Mr. Hunter wishes to persuade us are "more English than the English." It is an unfortunate phrase to use. The Honourable gentleman probably had in his mind the description of the disorderly English of the tale, who were Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores—more unruly, more bloodthirsty, more treacherous, and more opposed to their lawful sovereign, than even the wild Irishry of the interior. Are we to understand that the Bengalee, who is more English than we ourselves are, is so in the same sense as the English in Ireland in the 17th century, namely, in that he imitates us and surpasses us in all our vices? If so, the phrase is hardly a recommendation.

23. I have been led insensibly from describing what I believe to be the feelings of my own countrymen to discussing the attitude of the second of the three classes affected by this Bill—the educated native. I have said that this class is a creation of our own. Natives educated to such an extent that in the opinion of some persons they have become thoroughly English in their ideas, and fitted to hold the highest posts under Government, are to be found chiefly in Bengal, and it is therefore the educated Bengalee whom we must consider in this connexion.

24. It is well known to every student of history that, down to the establishment of English rule in Bengal in 1765, that province was the most distant and neglected portion of the Mogul Empire, and Bengalees themselves freely admit that their rise in wealth and civilization has been effected entirely under British rule. We may be proud of the improvement that has taken place during the last century and a quarter, and we may fairly ascribe much of it to the education which has been imparted to the people.

25. But in one respect at least it seems to me that this education has led to awkward consequences. What is called the higher education has been pushed on because it yielded more brilliant results, while we have neglected the less showy but more solidly useful task of educating the masses. In Bengal, where wealth is concentrated in the hands of a very limited number, while the great majority of the people have very small incomes, the youths who pursue their studies up to the highest level are for the most part poor, and have to earn their bread in after life.

26. Now, if the country at large had been educated pari passu with this small class of youths—if it had attained to a civilization in any way resembling that of European countries—these educated young men would readily find a livelihood in liberal professions, in commerce, or artistic and scientific employments. But the civilization of the country has lagged so far behind the higher education, that there is little or no occupation for members of the liberal professions.

27. A certain number of the graduates of the University find employment as pleaders and law agents, and a few earn a livelihood by the practice of medicine. But these are only a small fraction of the multitudes of educated youths who are yearly turned out of our schools and colleges. In default of any other means of earning their bread, most of them press into the Government service, and as the lower ranks get more and more overstocked, they push forward into the higher ones. They are not hindered by any modest doubts as to their own fitness for high employ. Those who are not successful become naturally discontented and outwardly at least disloyal. It is men of this already numerous class who take to writing in the native newspapers in a tone of disaffection to Government, which is partly adopted to make their papers sell, and is partly nothing more than the jaundiced views of life held by all disappointed and unsuccessful men.

28. Unfortunately the natives of this class have succeeded in persuading influential persons in India and England that their views and their utterances represent the real feelings and aspirations of the native population in general. Nothing could be more entirely mistaken than this idea. There is in reality no disloyalty or discontent in the minds of the people at large, nor is there, in point of fact, in the minds of the class who write most disloyally. If the editor of the most seditious paper in Bengal were to get a well-paid appointment to-morrow, he would assert that the British rule in India was a pattern of excellence, justice, and enlightenment. It is a pity that so much weight is attached to the opinions of these people. They are doubtless very clever, and write and speak very eloquently. But all their opinions are in truth nothing but place-hunting and power-hunting, more or less artfully disguised. By the mass of their countrymen these people are regarded as aliens, as more than half English, and are looked on by the orthodox classes with positive dislike, as men who have forsaken the faith of their fathers. If we wish to gratify the natives of this country by giving effect to their wishes and consulting their opinions, we must not go to this class, whose eagerness for power and discontent with their present condition render them the very worst possible exponents of the real feelings of their countrymen.

29. I now come to the real native of the country. I mean by this term those native gentlemen of respectability and experience who have not severed themselves from the mass of their countrymen, but who still remain leaders of such public opinions as exists, and true representatives of national feeling. Many of them know English, but their knowledge has not led them into discontent with their lot or disloyalty to their rulers. In an informal way I have taken pains to get at the opinion regarding the Bill held by the principal members of this class.

30. I find that their prevailing feeling is one of indifference to the whole question. They however, admit that they would always much rather have an Englishman to try their cases than a native, and they think it highly reasonable that Englishmen should have this feeling also. They think that the passing of this Bill will be very disastrous to their interests, as it will tend to produce in the minds of the Englishmen, whom they still persist in regarding as the ruling power in India, feelings of hostility to natives, and a cessation of that kindliness and interest in their welfare which they have always experienced at their hands. I am afraid that this apprehension is already being justified. I am not the only one who has noticed a growing dislike to natives on the part of Europeans, and a growing impertinence and insubordination on the part of natives of the educated classes, and, what is still more lamentable, on the part of school-boys and youths at college, who are too young to understand the real questions at issues, and do but give expression noisily and offensively to the opinions of others. The natives as a class do not think that they will be in any degree compensated for a loss of the favour and protection of English officials by the elevation to positions for which they are not (in their opinion) fitted, of a small number of ambitious young men who, while ceasing to be genuine Hindus, have not succeeded in becoming genuine Englishmen.

31. I have endeavoured, in the preceding paragraphs, to give the results of my own observations as to the real opinions of all classes concerning this Bill. I have not thought it necessary to go into all the legal arguments for and against the measure. This task has been ably and exhaustively performed by better men than me, and it would be superfluous for me to attempt to improve on their speeches or writings. I will merely sum up by expressing my firm opinion that the measure is not called for by any administrative inconvenience, that it is not desired by the natives as a body, that it is intensely distasteful and humiliating to all Europeans, and that it will tend seriously to impair the prestige of British rule in India. In fact, under a very simple and insignificant form, it conceals the elements of a revolution which may ere long prove the ruin of this Empire.

32. Is it worth while to risk all this to gratify the vanity of a small class in one only out of the many nationalities into which India is divided? These nationalities have no bond of union, and there are very few of them that would consent to be governed by Bengalees. These young men who now clamour for this privilege knew when they entered the Civil Service that they would not be allowed to try Europeans; yet they strive to make out that conditions which they accepted with their eyes open are now felt by them as a slur and a hardship.

33. I do not of course lose sight of the assertion of Government that this small measure is complete in itself, and that no further concessions are intended. I have no doubt whatever that Government is perfectly sincere in making this assertion. But this, or any succeeding Government, may be driven by force of circumstances to make further concessions. When you have once set your foot on an inclined plane, it is difficult to avoid sliding to the bottom.

34. And although Government thinks it can stop at this point, the educated natives do not think so, and they have told us, through their public organs, that they will not be satisfied with this measure, but will continue to agitate for still greater concessions, and to press their claims until not a single appointment is left to Europeans. They are at the present moment full of exultation and the hope of a coming triumph: for as a triumph over their former masters they regard it, and make no secret of their opinion.

35. On the other hand, the minds of Europeans are full of apprehension, of coming defeat and humiliation, and even the uneducated natives are getting dimly to perceive that a great change is at hand, which in some mysterious way, and for reasons which they can no more comprehend than we ourselves can, will lead to the putting down of the "Sahib" and the raising up of the "Baboo."

36. Now, if already, within the short space of time that has elapsed since the Bill was first heard of, these feelings have arisen, is it possible for Government to say that they will go only so far, and no farther? And it matters little—it will affect the peace of the country very little—for Government to say that they never intended that people's minds should get into this state of excitement and exasperation. Whether intended or not, the feeling is here before us, and it seems to my humble judgment that a wise statesman, when he sees that a Bill which he thought innocuous, has for some reason roused up a bitter spirit of mutual antagonism between different classes of the community, and has been an apple of discord suddenly thrown among them, would at once withdraw the cause of offence. He would study the views and tempers of those for whom he had to legislate, and feel carefully the public pulse before he again proposed so delicate a measure.

37. Of course we are all aware that there has hitherto been so little public opinion in India, especially among Europeans, that an Indian legislator has been able, without risk of causing dissatisfaction, to frame his measures to a great extent in disregard of what the people may think. But on the present occasion we have a distinct and unmistakeable expression of opinion, which, though disfigured at first by some intemperance of expression, is undoubtedly deep and lasting, and of such a character as no statesman, no ruler who is not a mere autocrat supported by armed force, can afford safely to disregard.

38. All who wish well to this great Empire, and take an earnest interest in the prosperity and progress of all classes, whether native or European, cannot but earnestly hope and pray that this most mischievous Bill may be withdrawn, and that means may be found for gratifying the legitimate aspirations of the educated natives, without placing them in the perilous position of being hated by their European fellow-subjects.

39. It has been pointed out by several writers in the public journals, and by several of the officers whom I have consulted, that the Bill as it now stands will render it impossible for any European Deputy Magistrate who may hereafter be appointed, as well as for the numerous European Honorary Magistrates in the interior, to try their own countrymen. Surely this is creating a far greater anomaly than that which it is desired to remove; and this step has not even the recommendation, if recommendation it be, that the rest of the Bill has, for it cannot in any way tend to remove whatever slur there may lie on native civilians, to cast a slur on European Magistrates.

40. I have selected three of the letters I have received for submission to Government. The letters of the Magistrates of Burdwan and Midnapore are, I think, very forcibly and ably written. The third letter is by Mr. Brojendronath Dé, Joint-Magistrate of Hooghly, and may be taken to express the views of the small section of native society to which he belongs. Mr. Dé entirely fails, in my opinion, to see the real point at issue, and there is a tone of dislike to Europeans, and almost disrespect towards Government, that augurs badly for the future conduct of this class, if they got the power they desire into their hands. I look upon this letter as one of the strongest arguments against Mr. Dé's view of the case that could be imagined.

No. 43G., dated 13th April, 1883.

From—W. R. LARMINIE, Esq., Magistrate of Burdwan,

To—The Commissioner of the Burdwan Division.

With reference to your circular memorandum No. 50, dated 4th instant, forwarding copy of letter No. 1518J, dated 27th ultimo, from the Secretary to the Government of Bengal, and asking for an expression of my opinion on the subject of the proposed amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, I have the honour to state as follows:—

2. The question in its general aspect has been so thoroughly discussed in the public prints and elsewhere, that it seems unnecessary for me to undertake a detailed examination of the various arguments for or against the proposed Bill. It will, I think, suffice for me to set forth briefly what appear to be the salient points on each side of the controversy, and to state what my own views are, giving my reasons therefor, whether derived from general considerations or from personal experience.

3. The arguments in favour of the Bill are two-fold—first, it is alleged that it will get rid of an unnecessary anomaly, and remove a judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions; secondly, it is urged that the passing of the Bill is necessary to prevent serious administrative inconvenience within a measurable distance of time. The first argument is based upon a general principle, involving a question of national policy: the second depends upon an actual state of facts.

4. It is impossible for any man holding liberal views to deny the expediency of removing distinctions founded merely on differences of race or class, provided that the evil consequences of such removal do not more than counterbalance the benefits that must naturally result from action founded on sound general political principles, and provided that the proposed change is one of sufficient magnitude to justify the rousing of an opposition which, even if unreasoning, is in itself an actual evil.

5. The opponents of the Bill traverse both these provisos. They allege that the race antagonism which has been excited by the mere proposal of the Bill, and which would be perpetuated if it were passed, will be productive of infinitely greater mischief to the country than any amount of theoretical relief to sentimental disabilities can possibly counterbalance, and they further argue that the anomaly which it is proposed to remove is of such an isolated and superficial character that the mere fact of the existence of a bitter opposition on the part of those to be affected by the change is sufficient to condemn the whole proceedings.

6. To the allegation that administrative inconvenience would necessarily result unless the Bill be passed, a point blank denial is given.

7. In addition to these demurrers, there has been made the further positive assertion that the men whom it is proposed to vest with the powers of a Justice of the Peace are actually unfitted for the exercise of those powers.

8. In my opinion the opponents of the Bill are victorious all along the line. The most intense animosity has been excited amongst those who would be affected by the change. I can testify that in this district the feelings of Europeans of all classes are unmistakeably roused, and I have no doubt that, if the Bill were passed, the hostility which is now felt to the measure, and possibly to its more prominent supporters, would, in the case of many, extend to the whole machinery of Government. It would be well to hesitate before allowing the possibility of such a disaster to occur.

9. Further, on general principles, it is of the highest importance that those subject to the jurisdiction of certain courts should have confidence in the fairness and justice of those courts; but if the Bill were to become law, a whole community would be subject to tribunals which they not only distrusted, but viewed as alien and almost hostile. Indeed, in some parts of Bengal, I have not the slightest doubt that an attempt on the part of a Native Magistrate to carry out the law by imprisoning a British European subject, more especially if of the female sex, would lead to a serious disturbance, possibly resulting in loss of life. From all these practical considerations it seems to me that it would be impolitic, nay almost dangerous, to the interest of the country to run in the face of a wide-spreading and almost fierce opposition, merely for the purpose of removing a disability which can possibly affect but few, and in the removal of which I believe that some even of those few are but slightly interested.

10. Next as to the alleged administrative inconvenience. As far as I can see, there is little or no probability that any such would accrue. Magistrates of districts seldom try cases and there are very few, if any, districts frequented by Europeans in which there are not several Justices of the Peace. As regards Sessions Judges, the extension of railroads will prevent any serious inconvenience being experienced. It may be well to observe, however, that even if Native Magistrates were vested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace, it is very improbable that they would be appointed to districts in which there were a large number of Europeans, for there are many considerations, of almost greater importance than that now under discussion, which would render it impolitic that such appointments should be made.

11. It might illustrate the above argument if I were to instance the case of the Ranecgunge sub-division. Although there are a large number of Europeans resident therein, but little inconvenience would result if the Sub-divisional Officer were not vested with the powers of a Justice of the Peace, for any case of European British subject could easily be tried in Burdwan, or a competent officer could be sent to Ranecgunge. At the same time I think it would be very injudicious to place a native Magistrate in charge of the sub-division, for this reason, amongst others, that he could not secure the co-operation of the European residents in the administration of affairs, or in carrying out any works of public utility.

12. It now remains for me to discuss the question of personal fitness. I would gladly avoid doing so, for I number several of the native members of our service amongst my friends, but it is absolutely necessary to give the result of experience in regard to this element of the discussion as opposed to the general allegations made by some who evidently spoke without knowledge. I have had the advantage of having official relations with six native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, three of whom were appointed after competition, and three by selection. My personal acquaintance with one of the former was slight, and I shall therefore say nothing with regard to him; but with reference to the others, I have no hesitation in saying that I would remove from their file any case in which the personal liberty of a European was concerned. I do not say this with any intention of attributing to them any want of zeal or honesty of purpose, nor do I think they would always err on the side of harshness; but they are undoubtedly deficient in that strength of character which would be absolutely necessary for the trial of such cases.

13. Influences of various sorts would be brought to bear upon them, and I candidly confess that I do not think they would be able to withstand them.

14. To sum up, then:—The theoretical advantages which the Bill proposes to secure are of the slightest: the immediate practical advantages are non-existent.

The passing of the Bill would excite a violent storm of hostility to Government, and perpetuate a race animosity most injurious to the interest of the community.

The individuals whom it is proposed to invest with powers hitherto withheld are not fitted for their exercise.

No. 1435, dated 28th April, 1883.

From—R. H. WILSON, Esq., Magistrate of Midnapore,

To—The Commissioner of the Burdwan Division.

As requested in your endorsement No. 50, dated 4th April, I have the honour to submit an expression of my opinion regarding the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. It appears to me that the Bill involves no question of principle. It may be theoretically desirable that all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in India should be placed by the law in a position of equality. But this end would not be attained by the proposed legislation, which would merely slightly shift the line distinguishing European British subjects from persons of other nationalities. Moreover, as the English Empire in India exists, and is justified in maintaining itself only because Englishmen have proved themselves to be stronger and more capable of ruling justly than the natives of the soil, it is solely on the ground of expediency that our position can be reasonably defended, and principles applicable to institutions developed elsewhere from indigenous elements might lead to conclusions incompatible with the maintenance of our rule. In the remarks which follow, I shall therefore confine myself to the practical aspect of the question under consideration.

3. I do not think that any administrative inconvenience is likely to result from allowing the law to remain as it is. In most Bengal districts there is a Joint-Magistrate who has charge of the criminal judicial work, whether the accused persons are of European or Asiatic blood. I have been for some years Magistrate and Collector of large districts without trying a single original criminal case, and a Bengali gentleman occupying my position would naturally, and as a matter of course, act in the same way. There are some small districts which are often left without a Joint-Magistrate, but there can hardly be any administrative necessity for posting to such of these small districts as contain non-official Europeans a Magistrate and Collector of Asiatic blood. In districts containing a large body of non-official Europeans, it will always be necessary to have a European Collector, and this necessity would be in no way affected by the proposed legislation, arising, as it does, not from any artificial provision of law, but from natural causes over which Government can exercise no control. A Lieutenant-Governor who placed a Bengali gentleman, however upright and enlightened, in a position in which an important part of his duty would be to exercise personal influence over a large body of English planters would, in my judgment, show a lamentable want of discretion. No one can regret more than I do the recent outburst in the public press of hostility between Englishmen and Bengalis; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the two races are in many respects different, and I am of opinion that it is, and will continue to be, sometimes the duty of Government to distinguish between them in selecting for particular duties those of its servants who are most capable of discharging them efficiently.

4. Apart from the question of administrative inconvenience, discussed in the preceding paragraph, the chief argument used in favour of the Bill is founded on the propriety of removing the slight put by the present law upon officials of Asiatic blood, and through them on Her Majesty's Asiatic subjects generally. This ground of objection to the law as it stands is sometimes stigmatized as sentimental; but what may be called mere sentiment is often a very important political force, and it appears to me that the argument, so far as it goes, is a good one, which should have its due weight. But the class which feels, or at all events which till recently felt, itself slighted is comparatively speaking a very small one. The native gentlemen whom the heads of Government meet in Calcutta are not fully representative of any large class throughout the country. Till the present proposal was brought forward, I do not believe that it had ever occurred to a single person among the two-and-a-half millions of Midnapore to feel himself slighted because civilians of Asiatic blood cannot, out of a Presidency town, try a European British subject. Now of course the case is somewhat different. An angry strife of words having arisen between Europeans and Bengalis, it is but natural that members of the latter class should take part with their fellow countrymen.

5. The opposition to the Bill has its first justification in the peculiar position of non-official Europeans in the interior of the country. An Englishman so placed must often have interests clashing with those of some of his neighbours and dependents, and must therefore expect to be made the subject of false criminal charges, which he has to meet at a considerable disadvantage, because he is no match for a Bengali in intrigue, and does not consider it justifiable to meet perjury with perjury. On referring to the General Administration Report for the year 1881-82, I find that of the criminal charges enquired into by the Bengal Police 9·6 per cent. were found to be entirely false. There are no similar statistics about non-cognizable offences, but the percentage of false charges under this head must be considerably larger. This is sufficient to show what an important element false complaints are in rural life in Bengal; and indeed to those who have any knowledge of the country, no such proof is necessary. Living, then, as he must in an atmosphere of intrigue, in which systematic perjury is among the ordinary incidents of every-day life, I think that the position of the most inoffensive English planter would be considerably less secure if he were liable to be tried by an Asiatic Judge or Magistrate. This opinion implies no distrust of the probity of native officials, many of whom, in positions much below that of a civilian, I know to be thoroughly upright and just; but it is always difficult for a judicial officer in this country to set at the real facts. Much more weight has to be given here than in England to circumstantial evidence and probabilities as compared with the direct statements of witnesses, and I cannot but think that a Bengali Judge's necessarily imperfect knowledge of English life and character would often place him at a great disadvantage in weighing the circumstances and probabilities of a case in which the accused person was an Englishman. Nor can I conceal from myself the fact that, partly through their own faults, partly from the force of circumstances, non-official Englishmen are very often objects of dislike to the native community, and that a Bengali Judge is likely to be sometimes unconsciously influenced by any strong wave of feeling moving the society in which he lives. It may be said that this argument applies to the trial of Bengalis by European Magistrates, and I think that there are certain classes of cases which a Native Deputy Magistrate can try more satisfactorily than a European Joint-Magistrate; but there is a considerable difference between the two cases, because the English Civilian has, and the Native Civilian has not, devoted his life to work involving a study of the character and habits of the foreigners to be brought before him for trial.

6. The above considerations have special force in the case of Englishwomen. You are aware that one of the commonest Bengali devices for annoying an enemy is to bring a false charge of such a character as to involve the appearance in court of some female relative of the person accused, and it is not probable that this weapon will be forgotten or laid aside if Englishwomen should be made liable to the indignity of appearing before a Judge whose ideas regarding their sex and its character, and regarding the lines which separate respect from insult, are altogether different from those which prevail in Europe. The Civilians of Asiatic blood appointed by competition have, I believe, all adopted the European mode of life; but the Bill draws no distinction between them and the nominated members of the Service.

7. It may be said that the evils which I apprehend from the proposed measure have not arisen in the presidency towns; but a very little consideration is sufficient to show that the two cases differ widely. In a presidency town a non-official European has generally nothing to do, except in the way of commercial business, with any natives of India except his own servants. He lives very much as he would in England, and has no hostile intrigues to contend against. Circumstances of publicity unfavourable to successful perjury make the institution of false charges comparatively rare, the percentage in Calcutta for 1881-82 being 2·8 instead of 9·6, as in the mofussil. There is so little to bring him into collusion with his neighbours that an Englishman in Calcutta does not look upon the Magistrate's court as an institution personally concerning himself at all. He reads, or more probably does not read, the reports as he would in England, and that is all. But the management of land in almost any part of the province involves more or less of strife, as the history of our Government estates sufficiently shows. A planter cannot hope to be without enemies, who may at any time bring him into court, and the present question is therefore to him one of great practical importance. I am far from thinking that an English planter is always or generally in the right in his disputes; but the fact that he has to be controlled as well as protected from false charges only makes it the more necessary that as strong a hand as possible should be placed over him.

8. There can be no doubt that if there is no reasonable ground for the existing feeling against the Bill on the part of the European community, this feeling will in time subside and disappear; but it will be apparent from what has been said above that in my judgment their hostility is justifiable, nor do I think it likely that the time will ever come when Englishmen in India or elsewhere will acquiesce in a measure subjecting their wives and daughters to the criminal jurisdiction of Judges whose ideas on the subject of women and marriage are not European, but Oriental.

Note on the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill by BABU BROJENDRO NATH DE, Joint-Magistrate, Hooghly.

The present report has been called for on two points —

I.—The principle of the Bill.

II.—Whether any administrative inconvenience at present arises, or is likely to arise in the future, from the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges.

I.—On the first point it is needless to say much. All that could be said for or against the principle of the Bill has been already said in the course of the preliminary discussion of the Bill in the Supreme Council; and it is not possible to add to the clearness and force with which the arguments pro and con were there stated. It may not, however, be entirely useless to mention one or two considerations in favour of the principle of the Bill. A great deal has been said by the opponents of the Bill about the Briton's birthright. It is hardly necessary seriously to refer to these arguments. The only ground on which the principle of the Bill can be impugned is on an assumption that European British subjects cannot expect, and will not receive, justice at the hands of the officers who will be invested with jurisdiction over them if the Bill becomes law. Such an assumption can only be justified by a reference either to the proved incapacity or ignorance of the officers in question, or to their proved corruptibility. If it can be shewn that these officers are either so ignorant of what will be required of them in the trial of European British subjects, or are so likely to be swayed by unworthy race feelings that European British subjects will not receive a fair trial in their courts, then, but then only, should the Bill be thrown out.

I will take the two points separately:—

(a). The alleged incapacity or ignorance.—It may be said that a few years' residence in England cannot enable the officers in question to distinguish the nicer shades of a European British subject's feelings and springs of actions or the nicer social distinctions or considerations which may become the subject of consideration in the course of a trial in which European British subjects are the parties. It has also been said that these officers will be unable to unravel the skeins of falsehood and fraud, in the meshes of which a European British subject may be thrown by the class of natives of the country who consider the institution of false charges their only weapon of offence. This last argument is so manifestly absurd that it may be dismissed with a very few words. There can be no doubt that a Native Magistrate will be better able to detect the falsehood of a charge got up by his compatriots than a European, and if in these cases Europeans desire to be tried by their compatriots, such a wish can only be explained by an assumption on their part that European Magistrates are so thoroughly imbued with the idea that a European can do no wrong, that nothing but the strongest evidence would induce them to hear a complaint against a European while they would receive a complaint by a European with implicit confidence not only in his good faith, but in his ability to understand thoroughly the motives of his opponents and their modes of thought and action. I need not say that I do not believe that European Magistrates act on the principle just mentioned, and I mention it only as an assumption on the part of such Europeans as may have to stand before a Magistrate as offenders against the laws.

I will now turn to the other and more reasonable arguments founded on the alleged ignorance of the officers in question. I do not think that these arguments are valid, for the following reasons:—In the first place, the existence of this ignorance is simply a matter of assumption, and no proof has yet been adduced to show that it exists. These officers have resided in England, have studied English literature more or less thoroughly, and have attempted to learn and understand English modes of thought and action; and it is only reasonable to ask that they should not be adjudged ignorant of such modes of thought and action till the contrary is proved. In the second place, cases are tried on the broad principles laid down in the Penal Code and the Evidence Act, and not on individual or even national idiosyncracies or modes of thought. In the third place, it is almost the everyday experience of a Magistrate that in the trial of cases which come before him, he is confronted with modes of thought, combinations of motives, and conjunctures of events and circumstances of which he was entirely ignorant up to the moment. There cannot be a case more to the point than that of the newly-arrived European Civilian. He has, generally speaking, only a very superficial book knowledge of the language, and is entirely ignorant of the way in which the men to whom he has to administer justice think and act; yet if he hears what the parties have to say with patience, and tries to master the facts of the case and to understand how and under what circumstances they acted, he is generally able to hold the balance of justice evenly. And even in the case of European officers of lengthened experience and I may even add Native Magistrates trying natives, and English Magistrates trying Englishmen on English soil, is it not a fact almost of daily occurrence that the Magistrate has to decide on combinations of circumstances and motives, which are new to him, and which he would have considerable difficulty in imagining for himself? If the Magistrate possesses the amount of intelligence expected of a man in his position, and attempts to master the facts of the case and to enter into the motives and thoughts of the parties with patience and judicial impartiality, he can generally arrive at a correct conclusion; and I am aware of no circumstances which should induce any one to hold that the officers in question will be found wanting in these essential qualities in the trial of these particular cases.

(b.) I now come to the more serious matter of corruption. But as this charge has not been seriously made by any responsible person, but has only been insinuated in newspapers and by irresponsible public speakers, I will say nothing about it. In concluding this part of the note, I may say that although Native Covenanted Civilians have not tried many Europeans, except Mr. B. L. Gupta, who, as Presidency Magistrate, has done so, they have tried many cases in which Europeans were the complainants, or were more or less directly interested; but not one case has been yet pointed out in which they either displayed gross ignorance or laid themselves open to the faintest breath or insinuation of being actuated by unworthy race feelings. I may say that if such cases have not been pointed out, it has not been from any want of will on the part of the opponents of the Bill. The Englishman, which has "so ably focussed the opposition against the Bill," has not been slow to publish what it could get hold of against Native Magistrates and Judges, but up to the present moment it has only succeeded in reproducing the judgment of a Munsiff in a case which is yet sub judice and that of a Deputy Magistrate which was passed as long ago as 1877, and when the particular officer had been a Deputy Magistrate for only about a month.

II.—I now come to the second point on which an opinion has been called for. On this point, and generally in the course of the whole note, I have to refer somewhat frequently to my personal experiences and circumstances; but this is inevitable, as I am a party somewhat interested in the Bill. During nearly the whole of my service I have been in districts in which there was a fair sprinkling of non-official Europeans, but till lately no administrative difficulty has arisen, unless I may call the fact that I could not be placed in charge of one of the Tirhoot sub-divisions, although I served, I may at least say, without discredit at Durbhunga, an administrative difficulty. Administrative difficulties, however, began to arise when I was transferred to Raneegunge. I am not in a position to say what induced Government to transfer me to a sub-division like Raneegunge, and to transfer me again from the place after such a short period as two and a half months. I may, however, say that when I was transferred to Raneegunge, it was on condition that I should withdraw my application for privilege leave, which I had then made, and should not make such an application for six months. I do not say that this last condition made it compulsory on Government that I should be kept in Raneegunge for a similar period. In the exigencies of the public service I could no doubt be transferred from Raneegunge on the very day after I had received charge there; but in the absence of such an exigency, I could reasonably count on being kept at Raneegunge for at least six months. I am not aware whether any such exigency arose or not, but none came within my cognizance, except that I was supposed to have come into collision with the non-official Europeans. If my early transfer was necessitated by an administrative difficulty, it is undoubtedly to be laid at the door of the disability under which I laboured.

While at Raneegunge I had to try several cases in which European coal-proprietors were very much interested. In one case, Messrs. Apear and Company charged some of their tenants in Santa village with the culpable homicide of one of their peons, and in another I had to convict and punish some of the servants of the Walipur Concern on a charge of rioting and assaulting police officers while in the execution of their duty. In both these cases I came to conclusions adverse to the Coal Companies. While I had jurisdiction to try those important cases in which, and specially in the latter, the concerns were vitally interested, I could not try a paltry case in which the khansama of Mr. Whyte, the manager of Messrs. Burn and Company's works, charged the latter with committing an assault on his person. For the trial of this case, in which Mr. Whyte did not plead guilty, but which resulted in a conviction and a fine of Rs. 5, the District Magistrate had to come up all the way from Burdwan to Raneegunge, to the manifest detriment, I should think, of his other duties. If Mr. Whyte had in a straightforward manner pleaded guilty, it might have been a question whether I, as a native of India, could have entered into his feelings and adjudged him the proper punishment, but when he shielded himself behind a denial which must, now after his conviction, be considered to be false, I do not see why I could not have tried and punished him like any native offender against the law. I ought to mention that, as this case was tried after my transfer, what I have stated is from my recollections of what I heard from Mr. Inglis, my successor, in the course of private correspondence.

Another administrative difficulty has arisen within the last few days. I need only refer to it very briefly, as it must be within the recollection of the District Magistrate and the Divisional Commissioner. I refer to Mr. Warde-Jones' appointment at Serampore. I say nothing about Mr. Jones' fitness for the post, but it is certainly somewhat incongruous that he should have been placed in charge of the sub-division, over the head of a senior Deputy Magistrate like Babu Gobindo Chunder Bose. I think that if the Joint-Magistrate had not been a native of the country, he would have been deputed to Serampore, and this incongruous arrangement would not have been made.

I am clearly of opinion that where these administrative difficulties have arisen in the case of a single officer while he is yet a junior, greater difficulties must arise in the case of those who have attained to higher ranks, and that these difficulties will increase year after year.

No. 38 JJ., dated 7th May, 1883.

From—J. MONRO, Esq., Offg. Commissioner of the Presidency Division,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Judicial Department.

With reference to your No. 1518J of 27th March, I have the honour to submit the report therein called for regarding the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. I forward herewith the reports of district and sub-divisional officers, and I may mention that I have had frequent conversations on the Bill with other gentlemen, both European and Native.

3. My opinion is asked on two points—(a) the principle of the Bill; (b) whether any administrative inconvenience at present arises, or is likely to arise in future, from the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges.

4. So much has already been written on the subject, and the arguments on both sides have been so fully laid before Government, that any very lengthened report from me on the points at issue is not necessary. In reporting on the Bill, I have only in reality to repeat arguments already much more ably laid before Government.

5. It will be observed that every District Magistrate in the division condemns the principle of the Bill, and every European officer is of opinion that no administrative inconvenience is likely to arise if the law is allowed to remain as it stands. The Native officials, on the other hand, approve of the principle of the Bill, and, with one or two exceptions, are of opinion that administrative inconvenience is likely in the future to arise. In short, official opinion on the Bill is identical with non-official views, all Europeans condemning, and all Natives approving, the principle of the Bill.

6. The object with which the Bill has been prepared is set forth in the Statement of Objects and Reasons: it is "to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinction."

7. It seems to me that, while the principle of the Bill is, when viewed as an abstract proposition, apparently good and logical, it is practically unsound and illogical with reference to the tenure on which we hold, and the circumstances under which we carry on, our administration in India.

8. It is impossible to ignore the fact that we hold the country by right of conquest; and although it is our bounden duty to do all we can for the benefit of the various races in India, any attempt to govern them on principles of universal equality must involve political suicide. This may appear a harsh doctrine: but with reference to the facts of history and present administration, it must, it seems to me, be admitted that, so long as the numerical proportion of Europeans and Natives is what it is, government of the country on principles of universal equality is impracticable.

9. It is further impossible not to recognize the fact that there are race distinctions between ourselves and the people of India. We do recognize the existence of such race distinctions morally, socially politically, and until now, judicially. It is now, however, proposed to wipe away race distinctions as regards judicial qualifications and disqualifications of Natives, while allowing such distinctions to remain as before, when regarded from a moral, social, or political point of view. We continue to admit that, as regards morals, social customs, political status, the Natives of India stand, owing to race distinctions upon a different platform from that of Europeans, but we propose to consider the races as amalgamated and homogeneous as regards judicial qualifications. We continue to send missionaries to convert the followers of Mahomet and the idolatrous Hindoos. We lament the low standard of morality which prevails amongst both these races. We are constantly exhorting them to develop female education, and make woman a companion instead of a prisoner. We decry early marriage, polygamy, and prohibition of re-marriage of widows. We find it necessary to exclude Natives from the European army, and to prevent them having arms except under license ; in all these, and many other respects, we acknowledge, in our moral, social, and political code, that there are wide race distinctions between Europeans and Natives of India, which must tend to keep the races widely apart. It has hitherto been customary to make a similar distinction between the races as regards judicial qualifications. Such distinction it is now proposed to abolish.

10. I confess that I hardly see why it should be considered sound policy to make this innovation judicially, while the causes and effects of race distinctions between Europeans and Natives in other respects are untouched. It seems to me inconsistent to create, or attempt to create, homogeneity as regards judicial qualifications or disqualifications, when the two peoples remain separated by distinctions of race, morally, socially and politically. I venture to think that, so long as there is such a wide divergence between the races as regards moral standards, social customs, and political status, any abolition of race distinction, with reference to judicial qualifications or disqualifications, must be considered premature. When the two races approach more nearly to one another morally and socially, the necessary divergence which now exists, as regards judicial qualifications or disqualifications, will disappear naturally ; but it will not disappear by virtue of a legislative enactment, which in principle attempts to anticipate the effects of probably centuries of association between different races.

11. I make these remarks, because it seems to me impossible to ignore the fact that the proposed change in the law is looked upon by both Europeans and Natives as involving a race question. It may to the Native seem improper that the European should hesitate to give up any privilege which he has hitherto enjoyed, simply on the ground of pride or prejudice of race. But none the less is it a fact that Europeans do hold this view, and in discussing the question, we have to deal with facts and not with theories. That Natives regard the question as one involving race distinction is everyday proved by the articles in the native press ; and although every Hindoo would regard with horror any proposal to diminish the race distinctions of a Brahman, or remove the perpetual race disqualifications of a Sudra, it is considered by all an unbecoming anomaly that Europeans should refuse to part with a privilege which they enjoy as members of the dominant race, in favour of those who amongst themselves retain race distinctions with merciless severity.

12. I proceed now to discuss the principle of the Bill.

I am opposed to the principle proposed for the following reasons :—

First of all, it is, in my opinion, unjust to Europeans.

India has now been at peace internally for a quarter of a century, and the increase of commercial prosperity during that period has been marvellous. There seems to me to be a decided tendency to undervalue the fact that such prosperity has been achieved by European exertion and European capital. Whether we look at railways, shipping, trade, commercial enterprise of every kind, the mark of the European is everywhere visible ; and apart from the question of dominant race altogether, it seems to me that the interests of the large non-official community, whose exertions have made India commercially what it is, merit the highest consideration in dealing with any question which vitally concerns them. I do not by any means ignore our duties to the vast Native population. In that respect none of the officers of Government have ever been wanting ; but the performance of such duties is, and ought to be, perfectly compatible with the due recognition of the high claim to consideration of their interests, which the efforts of Europeans towards the development of the country have created.

13. I consider that the principle of the Bill is unjust towards Europeans, firstly, because it withdraws from them a privilege which as a matter of fact, and of right, they have always enjoyed—the privilege of being tried by Europeans. There is no doubt that the possession of such a privilege has been, and is, highly valued by all Europeans in the country. There is absolutely no evidence that Europeans by their acts have done anything on account of which such privilege should be withdrawn ; it is incontrovertible that Europeans are entitled to retain their privilege unless they choose to waive it, and the retention of that right was guaranteed to Europeans at the time of the passing of Act X of 1872. I need adduce no arguments on these points. Upon none of them is there any doubt, and the compromise which was entered into in 1872 is on record in the Debates which took place on the Act of that year. There can be no doubt that the non-officials then agreed to accept the proposals of Government for extending the powers of Magistrates over Europeans, on the distinct understanding that such Magistrates or Justices of the Peace were to be European British subjects.

14. Secondly, the principle of the Bill is unjust towards Europeans, because it subjects them to a system of judicial administration which for good and sufficient reasons they distrust.

15. Europeans make no special complaint against the present system of judicial administration, or, at all events, they accept it, with all its defects, as the best system which, under the circumstances of the country, we can devise. But they are not prepared to accept a change which will place them judicially under officers whom they certainly do not trust as they do their own countrymen, and to whose exercise of jurisdiction over them they strongly object.

16. The objections which they entertain are of two kinds—first, with reference to the native officers themselves on whom it is proposed to confer jurisdiction over Europeans ; secondly, with regard to the consequences likely to result, so far as Europeans are concerned, from the presence in districts of native officers armed with powers to try European British subjects. It cannot be denied that natives generally are not so trustworthy as Europeans. This is most fully admitted by natives themselves, who, I have no hesitation in saying, prefer to have their cases, when possible, tried by European officers. On the impartiality of European officers, the great body of the people most thoroughly rely; they have not the same confidence in the unswerving fairness of their own countrymen. The reason for the existence of this state of feeling is not far to seek. The training of natives from their childhood, the enervating influence of the zenana on their up-bringing, early marriage, a low moral standard resulting from caste distinctions, and the influence of centuries of subjugation, all tend to hinder the development in Bengalis of those manly and straightforward qualities which, under other conditions, are found in Englishmen. A Bengali's first idea of duty, as I have been told by one of themselves, is to please his superiors, not to satisfy his own conscience; and in any difficulty his moral weakness, not his moral strength, is conspicuous.

17. What reasons, then, are there for supposing that in intricate questions in which Europeans are concerned (and we are assured that such cases generally are complicated and difficult)—what reason is there for supposing that native officers will show any higher qualities than those which they exhibit under other difficult circumstances? There is no reason, and on this account Europeans strongly object to be placed under them. They see their weakness and they distrust their impartiality, especially when any question of race or class prejudice is concerned.

18. I do not wonder at Europeans entertaining objections to any such change as is proposed. I am quite sensible of the progress which has been made in the education of the natives of India. I have had under me for years a staff of native magisterial officers who have performed their duties most creditably, and whose exertions I have had pleasure in acknowledging; but I am not on that account prepared to say that these officers were fitted to perform satisfactorily the duty of trying Europeans accused of criminal offences in the mofussil. And when I see of late years such active manifestations of race dislike as are chronicled in the native papers, I am all the more inclined to attach weight to the views held by Europeans, that justice might not be impartially administered to them by native officers.

19. It is further alleged that the particular danger to which Europeans in the mofussil are exposed is the institution of false charges, and that this danger would be very materially increased, were the power to try Europeans made over to native officers. On this point I entertain no doubt whatever, and it may safely be predicted that, whatever might be the merits of a Native Magistrate entrusted with the powers proposed to be conferred, the litigious enemies of any European in a district would feel encouraged to accuse him, in the hope that their efforts might be attended with more success than would probably result when such charges were tried by Europeans.

20. This danger from false cases is a very real one. About ten in every 100 police charges now preferred are declared by Magistrates to be deliberately and maliciously false. This is of itself alarming; and when it is borne in mind that in only 18 per cent. of such cases is any effort made to bring the malicious complainants to justice, it will easily be understood with what impunity such charges may be preferred.

21. It is difficult for official Europeans, protected by their position from many annoyances and attacks, to fully realise the dangers to which their non-official countrymen in the mofussil are often exposed. But such dangers are none the less real because they are not easily and to the full extent appreciated by those who are not exposed to them. I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that, in districts with Native Magistrates vested with the powers of trying Europeans, these dangers would be very largely increased. With a Native Magistrate acting as head of the District Police, with powers to direct enquiry into, as well as to try charges against Europeans, and believed, rightly or wrongly, to be not emancipated from race prejudices unfavourable to the aliens in his district, it would be strange if false cases did not increase, and if methods of judicial harassment of Europeans were not much more frequently resorted to than at present. To subject European men and women to the probability of such harassment by the adoption of the principle of the Bill would inflict on them, in my opinion, a grave injury, and give rise to more serious political dangers and anomalies than arise under the present system of judicial administration.

22. Thirdly, the principle of the Bill involves injustice to Europeans, inasmuch as, while it contemplates the bestowal on certain selected classes of natives of jurisdiction which they never as a body possessed, it deprives a large number of European officers and non-officials of powers which they have hitherto exercised. In future no European, who is not of the selected classes mentioned in the Bill, will be eligible to act as Justice of the Peace, and those Europeans who have hitherto been exercising the powers of a Justice will be disqualified from acting in that capacity. I see no justification for such a procedure. The number of Europeans who have hitherto been exercising those powers is by no means inconsiderable; and to deprive experienced and capable European officers of the jurisdiction in the case of European British subjects seems to me unjust, and tends to create administrative difficulties, the removal of which is one of the chief objects of the Bill.

23. Not only, however, does the adoption of the principle of the Bill involve injustice to Europeans, but its detailed provisions are at variance with the principle itself, and create distinctions amongst classes of natives, which they may well style unfair.

24. As stated above, the Bill proposes to remove at once and completely from the Code every judicial disqualification which is based on race distinction. If this is the principle of the Bill, why are other privileges of Europeans—privileges which they enjoy undoubtedly by virtue of race distinction—left untouched? It seems to me, for example, much more anomalous that a European should be allowed to choose his court of appeal, than that he should be compelled to waive his right to be tried by his fellow-countrymen.

25. As regards the natives who are to be empowered to try Europeans, I cannot see that the provisions of the Bill are logically defensible. The Bill divides the native officers practically into three classes—first, covenanted civilians who have obtained their appointments by competition in England; secondly, nominated members of the Civil Service; thirdly, Assistant Commissioners in Non-Regulation Provinces. I exclude Cantonment Magistrates, as we are told that natives will not ordinarily be appointed to such posts.

26. This classification practically announces the fact that the vast majority of the native officers, viz., all who are in the regular Uncovenanted Service, are not at present fitted for the exercise of the powers of trying European subjects; that is to say, that race disqualification in the case of all members of the Uncovenanted Service in Regulation Provinces is to continue, and that only in the case of a few selected members of the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Service is such race disqualification to be withdrawn.

27. I can understand a proposal which maintains the existence of race disqualification on the part of all natives to try Europeans, or which confers on all native judicial officers jurisdiction in such cases; but I fail to see any consistency in the principle of a Bill which, while professing to have for its object the immediate and complete removal from the Code of all race disqualifications, denies to the great majority of Native officials the abolition of such disqualifications, and practically confers new and extended jurisdiction on a comparatively small number of their countrymen.

28. This appears to me to be a most important admission of the existence of judicial disqualifications, based on race distinction on the part of the majority of native officers; and it may be well to enquire in what respects this race disqualification has been removed or modified in the case of the classes selected for the exercise of the jurisdiction contemplated by the Bill. I begin at the bottom of the list—

(a.)—Cantonment Magistrates.

I have remarked above that these offices are not intended to be held by Natives. If Natives are fit to try European officials and non-officials of every class, I hardly see why logically they can be pronounced unfitted to try European soldiers. Politically, there are very strong objections to Native Cantonment Magistrates trying offenders of this class, and these objections all resolve themselves into one—the existence of race distinctions. If a Native officer is not to be appointed a Cantonment Magistrate, and try European soldiers, on account of political (which are really race) objections, on what principle of consistency can it be affirmed that Native officers are, in spite of the existence of race distinctions, competent to try European Civilians? On what principle of fairness can it be proposed that a Native Covenanted Civilian should be appointed Magistrate of, and vested with powers to try Europeans in, the district of Patna, but that, on account of political (which are really race) objections, he should not be appointed Cantonment Magistrate or Sub-divisional Officer of Dinapore, six miles from the head-quarters of the Patna district.

This practical exclusion of Natives from the post of Cantonment Magistrates is, to my mind, a most convincing admission on the part of the framers of the Bill as to the necessity of retention of judicial race disqualifications.

(b.)—Assistant Commissioners.

(c.)—Members of the Native Civil Service.

In what respects have the race disqualifications attaching to members of the Uncovenanted Service been modified or removed in the case of these two classes?

In the case of Assistant Commissioners, these officers are actually members of the Uncovenanted Service, and there is nothing to prevent a Deputy Magistrate in Bengal from being employed as an Assistant Commissioner in Assam. In regulation districts, it is supposed that judicial procedure is more elaborate and supervision more close than in non-regulation provinces, where the system is more rough-and-ready, and officers more left to themselves. But according to the principle of the Bill, the regulation Deputy Magistrate is to have no jurisdiction, while the same officers, as non-regulation Assistant Commissioner, is to be invested with powers to try Europeans, under circumstances and in districts where there are fewer safeguards against abuse of his authority.

The officers of the Native Civil Service come from the same classes as those from which the Uncovenanted Service is recruited. They have the same race feelings as those of their brethren of the latter service, and save that they are not so experienced or so hard-working, there is no difference in respect of race qualification or disqualification between a Deputy Magistrate and a member of the Native Civil Service under the Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3.

(d.)—Covenanted Civilians.

Between these gentlemen and those in the Uncovenanted Service, there is this difference—that the former are more highly educated, and have been for three or four years at most resident in England. Are these circumstances sufficient to do away with, or radically modify, the race distinctions which exist between members of eastern and western nations? I hope not; for if the contrary were the case, essential characteristics of western civilization must be very superficial and unreal when they can be communicated to orientals within the short period of a three or four years' residence in a foreign country. That the gentlemen who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service have acquired some of the habits and modes of thought of Europeans, I freely admit : but my experience compels me to deny that, by their short residence in Europe, they have acquired the essential characteristics which remove or radically modify the race feelings common to them with all their educated countrymen, so as to enable them to understand the customs and modes of thought of European men and European women.

29. If, therefore, there is practically no difference as regards race qualifications or disqualifications between Native members of the Uncovenanted Service and Statutory Civilians and Assistant Commissioners, and if the only distinction between them and Covenanted Civilians is more superficial than real, on what principle of fairness to Natives are judicial disqualifications based on race distinction to be removed from some, and retained with reference to other classes of native officials? What practical benefit to Native officials, or to the judicial administration, will result from the appointment of these few selected officers, without reference to the existence of race disqualification? And on what principle of justice to Europeans is jurisdiction to be conferred on these small classes of Native officials who are, in all essentials, as disqualified by virtue of race distinction to exercise such jurisdiction as the whole body of Native Uncovenanted Deputy Magistrates to whom, under the Bill, the power to try Europeans is denied?

30. It will, I think, be admitted by all that a change in our judicial administration which is so repugnant to the feelings of Europeans in India, should not be carried out without some overwhelming necessity being shown for its introduction. Does any such necessity, exist?

31. It has been abundantly shown that Europeans unanimously condemn the principle of the Bill; and in spite of the violent and virulent manner in which the introduction of the measure has been demanded by the native press, I do not believe that the great majority of the inhabitants of the country wish for the measure at all. It is difficult to ascertain the views of the people on this point; for when any appearance of want of so-called patriotism is visited by relentless social persecution, as in the case of Rajah Shiva Persad, there are very few Native gentlemen who will hesitate to conceal their real opinion, and outwardly to commend, while inwardly they condemn, the introduction of the Bill.

32. The body who do wish for the introduction of the Bill are the political agitators of the press and their followers, and there can be no doubt that they look to the Bill as merely the thin end of the wedge, and the partial fulfilment of their hopes of obtaining increased power for natives, their ultimate object being to get rid of Europeans from important administrative posts. Of these agitators it may be said that if the language in which they have demanded, nay insisted, on the introduction of the Bill, is any real indication of their feelings, or those of Natives generally whom they profess to represent, then no more convincing argument could be found in support of the danger of entrusting any jurisdiction over Europeans to those in whom race feeling is so strongly, not to say virulently, developed.

33. Much stress is laid upon the Proclamation of Her Most Gracious Majesty as conferring rights upon Natives of India to have the jurisdiction contemplated by the Bill. But it appears to be forgotten that such Proclamation could give, and actually gave, no rights beyond those recognized by the law of the land; and it cannot be maintained that under any law had Natives of India the right to interfere with the privilege of the European to be tried by his own countrymen. I hold that the time for their interference with such privilege has not yet arrived, and that the law of the land in this respect should not be altered to remove a fancied grievance, and to gratify the political virulence of pretentious patriots.

34. That there is at present no administrative necessity for the introduction of the measure in these provinces at least, we have the assurance of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; and it is superfluous for me to add my testimony to his, as to no inconvenience having, as a matter of practice, been experienced from the existing constitution of the judicial administration. Nor do I see any reason to anticipate in the future that such executive difficulty will arise for many years, as cannot be met without a change in the law of the land and in the fundamental principles of our administration. Such a remote difficulty, I think, may be dealt with in the spirit of those remarks made on another occasion by the Mover of the Bill himself: "Sufficient for the statesman if he can grapple with the problem of the day; for the distant future he must leave posterity to provide."

35. The proposal to introduce the Bill has led to a display of acrimonious feeling on both sides, which is to be lamented. There is no appearance of such feeling subsiding or diminishing in bitterness, and there cannot be the least doubt that the change in the system of judicial administration, if carried out, will lead to consequences which must be disastrous to the best interests of the country. The mischief which has already been done cannot be undone; but it may, and certainly by passing the Bill into law will, be increased, and the feelings of exasperation which now prevail will be intensified. The breach in the harmonious relations between Europeans and natives, which was being gradually filled up, will be widened, and friendly co-operation between the two peoples in advancing the highest interests of the country will become difficult, if not impossible. The state of matters has even now led to a feeling of insecurity, which has already led capitalists to be chary of investing money in schemes for the development of the country; and if this feeling spreads, the consequences to the country will be financially disastrous.

36. On the whole, therefore, I am opposed to the principle of the Bill and its being passed into law—

(a) Because it contemplates the abolition of race distinctions judicially, while such race distinctions are allowed to remain untouched socially, morally, and politically;

(b) Because such abolition of judicial race disqualifications, under such circumstances, is premature, and therefore not advisable;

(c) Because the withdrawal of the privilege of being tried by their own countrymen is unjust towards Europeans, and opposed to the conditions of our occupation of the country—

1st—in ignoring their claim to retain a privilege which they have always enjoyed, and which was guaranteed to them in 1872;

2nd—in subjecting them to the jurisdiction of officers whom, for good reasons, they do not trust as they do their own countrymen, and in whose impartiality and freedom from race-feeling in the administration of justice they do not believe;

3rd—in depriving a large number of European officers of the powers which they have all along exercised;

(d) Because the detailed provisions of the Bill are at variance with its principle of immediate and complete abolition of race distinctions;

(e) Because the partial bestowal of jurisdiction on some classes of natives, who are equally fit (or unfit) with the selected officials to exercise such jurisdiction, is logically and practically indefensible;

(f) Because the selected classes of officials are not in reality more free from the influence of race feelings than those who, by the provisions of the Bill, are declared unfitted to try Europeans;

(g) Because there is not at present any administrative necessity for the change, and because there is no probability of any such necessity arising for years;

(h) Because the introduction of the measure is not desired by the great body of the natives but only by a few political agitators amongst them, and will confer no real benefit on natives at large;

(i) Because the adoption of the principle of the Bill, and its being passed into law, will widen the breach already existing between Europeans and natives, and will result in consequences disastrous to the best interests of the country.

No. 868G, dated 19th April 1883.

From—E. J. BARTON, Esq., C.S., Magistrate of Jessore,

To—The Commissioner of the Presidency Division.

In reply to your No. 32JJ of 17th instant, I have the honour to inform you that I do not consider it to be expedient to give to native civilians criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects.

2. Hitherto no administrative inconvenience of any kind has arisen in this district from native Magistrates not having criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. Jessore has for nearly a century been an indigo district, and at one time there were many European planters in it, and there are still several. As long as a European Magistrate is kept in this district, no European British subject could possibly escape trial for an offence. I may say that, in an experience of Jessore extending at intervals over a period of 14 years, I never heard, either from European or native, a whisper of discontent or complaint or any administrative inconvenience of the kind. The same remark applies to other districts of Bengal, of which I have been Magistrate and Collector, and where there are non-official European residents.

No. 756, dated 21st April 1883.

From—H. MOSLEY, Esq., Magistrate of Moorshedabad,

To—The Commissioner of the Presidency Division.

With reference to your No. 11JJ, dated 2nd April 1883, I have the honour to enclose copies of reports by the District Superintendent of Police and my Sub-divisional Officers on the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure.

2. The District Superintendent and Mr. Beames are both opposed to the measure, and their principal arguments amount to this, that the natives are not fitted for the power proposed to be given to them, and I quite agree with them in this, that if Europeans could be tried by native Magistrates, it would be impossible to feel sure that race prejudices and an inclination to flaunt a temporary superiority would not interfere with the due administration of justice.

3. The Sub-divisional Officer of Jungipore thinks the Bill should be passed, but his only reason seems to be that it would "affect merely an infinitesimal portion of the public, and the jurisdiction would be limited to a very selected few"—an argument which would be full of weight if he had used it to show that no change was necessary.

4. The Sub-divisional Officer of Kandi would pass the Bill, because if a native is fit to be in the Covenanted Civil Service, he is fit to exercise these powers.

5. For my own part I object to the Bill as unnecessary and dangerous.

6. I have had many years' experience of districts in which European British subjects have been comparatively numerous, and have never known any in which any inconvenience would have arisen if the Magistrate of the district had been a native. In point of fact, the Magistrate of the district hardly ever tries cases himself. He has no time to do anything of the sort, and as regards actual necessity, it would be almost more reasonable to enact that a District Magistrate should not, than that he should be, a Justice of the Peace.

7. During the whole of my service (and I have been much in European districts), I only remember one district in which I have tried European British subjects, and then it was as Joint-Magistrate. That district was Chittagong, and the defendants referred to were mostly English sailors of the lowest kind, to keep whom in check it was considered necessary to have English police, though only two were employed. I should be very sorry to try the experiment of having only native Magistrates to try these men, without very largely increasing the English police force. The danger would be extreme.

8. There is such a thing as moral power; an English Magistrate, as such, has a power over a low class Englishman which no native Magistrate could ever have; and no Native Civilian could ever, in my opinion, be safely sent as Magistrate of Chittagong, unless he had an English Joint, Assistant, or Deputy; that is to say, there would be as much administrative inconvenience in this regard, if the Bill were passed, as there may be now.

9. It is true that the present Bill only contemplates giving the power absolutely to native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, who become District Magistrates (Sessions Judges may be taken for the purposes of this letter as being included in the term), but it also gives Government power to include others. And my experience of the Native Civil Service (under Statute 33 Vic., cap. 3) tells me that, as regards this branch, the power would be most dangerous. As regards Cantonment Magistrates, I can scarcely conceive a more dangerous enactment. It may be said that the powers would not be lightly given; but I am afraid that the matter would drift into one of form, and that powers would be given in time almost as a matter of course.

10. It is also said that it is not contemplated going any further; but though that may be the intention now, it is quite possible, nay probable, that future Governments may refuse to be bound by present declarations, and that native clamour may induce the further extension of the present Bill to all Magistrates, which would have a most calamitous effect.

11. As matters stand at present, the parties most immediately affected are the European British subjects, and they have expressed in the most decisive manner their objection to the measure. Their opinions are deserving of most earnest attention. They, if they work well with the authorities, are of the greatest assistance to district officers in many ways; if they are alienated (and I can conceive of no more effectual way of alienating them than this Bill), they would be the cause of the greatest difficulties; and I can see no object in depriving district officers of their often invaluable assistance for the purpose of getting over a difficulty that has never been felt.

12. The arguments that district officers, when natives, would lose prestige because they could not try cases that a subordinate could, is, I think, untenable. They, as a rule, never do try cases, and certainly no District Magistrate ever adds to his prestige by trying cases, or loses it by not trying them.

13. If in future years it should be found that the present state of the law causes grave inconvenience, then will be the time to amend it; but it is a pity to alienate a powerful body of subjects, to whose enterprise and capital a large part of the prosperity of the country is due, for the sake of an idea.

14. The Bill has already done an incalculable amount of mischief by rousing race prejudices (on both sides) that were gradually dying down. It will be long before this is remedied, even though the Bill were withdrawn; if the Bill were passed, it would simply be perpetuated.

15. I may add that the distrust of Native Magistrates is not confined to Europeans. Very often (and I think all other Magistrates could say the same) I have had petitions from natives to transfer their cases to a European Magistrate, because they felt more sure of obtaining justice. If, then, this is the feeling where there are no race prejudices, what would it be in the contrary case?

16. I repeat, then, that I think the Bill unnecessary and dangerous. As to its getting rid of an anomaly, it should first be considered whether that anomaly is inconvenient. I do not think it is, and I certainly think that there are many other anomalies which might with great advantage be first attacked. There are numerous anomalies (e.g., exemption from attendance in civil courts granted to natives, but not to Europeans; indulgences to native women, which are never granted to their European sisters), which might better be attacked than the one now spoken of, which, as far as my experience goes, has never caused the slightest difficulty, nor seems to me likely to do so.

No. 106, dated 11th April 1883.

From—H. B. BEAMES, Esq., Deputy Magistrate, City Moorshedabad,
To—The Magistrate of Moorshedabad.

In reply to your circular No. 635 of the 7th April, I have the honour to submit the following.

The first objection which forces itself on one is that the jurisdiction over Europeans is to be taken away from Uncovenanted Magistrates, who have hitherto exercised their powers in this respect to the entire satisfaction of the public, and given to members of the Native Civil Service, who are not better qualified by education and training than the European members of the Uncovenanted Service, and who, in consequence of their nationality, are infinitely less capable of forming a correct judgment in matters in which Europeans are concerned.

2. I speak from experience when I say that cases in which Europeans are defendants and natives complainants require the most delicate handling on the part of the Judge.

3. Take a case of assault, for instance. In cases where gentlemen of position and high principle are defendants, the matter is simple enough. The defendant is asked whether he committed the offence or not. If he admits it, or part of it, it remains only to give judgment accordingly, or after such examination of the prosecutor and his witnesses as may be thought necessary.

4. If, on the other hand, the defendant is a low-born European, who fights the native with his own weapons and denies the charge point-blank, it remains to be seen whose story is true; and in so doing, to allow for the habitual exaggeration and disregard for truth displayed by natives in the criminal courts, and so with difficulty to sift the true from the false.

5. I myself would gladly forego trying such cases, for with the best intentions one may err, and the consciousness of the delicacy of the situation is productive of great anxiety.

6. Now, if I a European feel this, how much more awkward must a native under the same circumstances feel, supposing him to be bent on performing his duty conscientiously and to the best of his ability.

7. He would know that if he made a false step public opinion would be eager to charge him with injustice or malice, as the case might be, or he might think that, in convicting the European, his motives would be certainly attributed to race feeling, and this might make him err on the side of leniency to the European.

8. On the other hand, a European is secure against all this, and this natural independence of character would, in any case, render him more indifferent to the voice of public opinion than the native.

9. Lastly, there is another objection which is paramount, and which, in the absence of all others, is, in my opinion, fatal to the amendment.

10. I allude to the case of a Native Judge with strong race prejudices, or open to corrupt influences.

11. That there have been such is well known; that there will always be such is highly probable.

12. I have had very painful personal experience of Judges of this sort, so that I am well qualified to speak on the subject.

13. In Rajshahye, in 1871, a civil suit was brought against me, for the alleged use of abusive language, by a mookhtear.

14. The feeling in the place against Europeans ran very high at that time, and every one, from the Judge and Magistrate downwards, was abused in the weekly papers in the most infamous and abominable language.

15. The plaint in the case just mentioned was filed in the court of the Moonsif of the place, and on going into the court to ask what date was fixed for the trial of the case, the Moonsif's behaviour was so insulting that I felt certain I should never get justice there, and so I got the case removed to the court of the Subordinate Judge.

16. Here, though the Judge himself was most courteous and polite, the pleaders were so insolent, and made so many open and offensive remarks, that to avoid insult I was obliged to get the District Judge to take the case up and try it himself.

17. Twenty-eight witnesses were cited to perjure themselves on this occasion by the prosecutor, and men I had hitherto looked on as highly respectable, and treated with habitual courtesy and kindness, came into court and lied to as the manner born.

18. The Judge's experienced eye saw through them from the first, and in dismissing the case gave me permission to prosecute the complainant for bringing a false charge.

19. The next case was in Gya, where I was prosecuted civilly for a legal act done by my predecessor.

20. The suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge, on the grounds that the act was legal, in the first place, and that, secondly, my predecessor, not myself, had done it.

21. No Judge could well have given a different decision; but a Judge hostile to Europeans might have made matters very unpleasant for me.

22. The last and most serious case was before another Subordinate Judge of Gya, in which I was prosecuted conjointly with one zemindar, by another rival zemindar, for giving the former possession, under section 530, Civil Procedure Code, of certain land and crops in dispute between them.

23. I was most ably defended by the Government Pleader, and the last day before the Doorga-pooja holidays, the Judge informed the pleader that he was quite satisfied with the defence, and that he need say no more, and that he would give judgment after the holidays.

24. What was our astonishment when the Judge came into court after the holidays, and gave judgment against us.

25. We appealed the case to the High Court, and for three years I was in the greatest anxiety as to the result; but the present Chief Justice, Sir Richard Garth, reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge, complimented me on my action in the matter, giving me heavy damages, and seriously censured the Subordinate Judge for his conduct in the case. This judgment was printed and circulated by the Government of Bengal.

26. I am of opinion that the time has not come for natives in the Civil Service, even much less for natives in the Native Civil Service and the Commission, to be charged with such tremendous responsibilities as are contemplated by this amendment.

27. In my Administration Report, I have also pointed out what a deterrent effect this amendment, if passed into law; would exercise on the in-flowing of European capital, and consequently what a disastrous effect it would have on the country itself.

No. 404, dated 11th April 1883.

From—A. ANLEY, Esq., District Superintendent of Police, Moorshedabad,

To—The Magistrate of Moorshedabad.

Having been asked in your circular No. 635, dated the 7th instant, to give an expression of my opinion regarding the proposed amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, so far as relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects by Native Magistrates, I have the honour to state—

1. That I am directly opposed to such a course being adopted.

2. Such a procedure would, I firmly believe from my 20 years' experience as a police officer, be used by the natives as a means of annoyance and insult to European ladies and others.

3. I could quote innumerable instances which have directly come under my personal notice, in which utterly false cases have been brought against Europeans by the natives, and in which, had they been tried by Native Magistrates, they would not, owing to ignorance of European character, have received that justice which has been meted out to them.

4. As a police officer of some experience, I can candidly say that times innumerable have I been called up as a witness in different courts, and in some Native Magistrates' courts have been subjected to cross-examinations, not only utterly irrelevant, but to questions simply put with a view to insult, which would never have been allowed in the court of a European.

5. If native character is so opposite to the European—the natives do not mix with the Europeans; the European officials are compelled to study the native character; the natives, on the other hand, have neither opportunity nor inclination to study the character of Europeans—that, in my opinion, to put such a power in the hands of a native as to allow him to try a European would be dangerous in the extreme; would lead to many complications; would, in a district where there are many non-official Europeans, paralyse trade, inasmuch as, with the prospect of being hauled up in a totally false case before a Native utterly ignorant of European manners, customs, character and habits, would induce many Europeans to give up their business rather than submit to such an indignity.

6. Furthermore I see no necessity for the measure. The ordinary native criminal would far rather be tried by a European Magistrate. The Europeans so far have been tried only by Europeans, and the European has so far been allowed the right to demand being tried by his countrymen; why then alter this? I do not believe, on the one hand, that a Native would wish to try a European any more than the European would wish not to be tried by the Native.

From—BABOO SARADAPROSAD SERKER, Sub-divisional Officer of Kandi,

To—The Magistrate of Moorshedabad,

With reference to your circular No. 635, dated the 7th instant, I have the honour to report that the vesting of the power to a certain selected class of Natives has not created, among the Native community, the same feeling of rejoicing as that of agitation among certain European quarters. The rule of the admission of Natives into the Indian Civil Service has secured, for some selected few, with powers to hold higher offices for purposes of administration. The gradual increase of social connection between European and Natives in this country necessitates the vesting, in the same officers occupying highest posts in a district, with jurisdiction over both classes. When the privilege of admission was given to hold such posts to Natives, I do not consider that any feeling of race distinction ought to be allowed to stand. If the officers be considered efficient for every other work, why they could be considered inefficient for some special work? The men who are now proposed to be vested with the power have got special training, and their number is very few, and so they are the fit object for a trial; and if they prove inefficient, it lies in the power of the Legislature to withdraw it. "A breathe can make them as a breathe has made" (sic in original).

From—BABOO JUGGO BONDHU BHATT, Deputy Magistrate of Jungipore,
To—The Magistrate of Moorshedabad.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 635, dated 7th instant, calling for an early expression of my opinion on the Bill drafted to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, and in reply to submit as follows.

2. So much has of late been said and written on the subject that any opinion I might offer will simply be of no value. The Bill has been discussed in and out of the Imperial Council; it has been made the subject of debate at meetings held throughout the length and breadth of India; it has been commented upon by newspaper editors and political critics both here and at Home, and was at last brought on the tapis in the noble House of the Peers of Great Britain. The sum and substance of the discussion, it appears to me, is that the Natives of India look upon the provision of the Bill as just, and such as Government ought equitably to concede to them. The oppositions, on the other hand, think it unsafe and imprudent to jeopardise the safety of the person and property of British-born subjects, by entrusting it to the hands of Natives. But, considering the facts that the measure proposed by the Government of India will affect merely an infinitesimal portion of the public at large, inasmuch as the exercise of the jurisdiction is to be limited to a very selected few, it appears to me the Bill ought not to be objected to, but passed into law.

No. 888, dated 23rd April 1883.

From—W. CLAY, Esq., Magistrate of Khoolna,
To—The Commissioner of the Presidency Division.

I have the honour to reply to your memorandum No. 11JJ of the 2nd instant, desiring me to express my opinion upon the subject mentioned in the letter No. 1518 of the 27th March last, from the Officiating Secretary to the Government of Bengal to your address (Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, &c.).

2. I beg to state that, for the following reasons, I am distinctly opposed to the Bill, both as to its principle and on account of the absence of any administrative ground, either in the present or the near future, for a change which is so serious and so obnoxious to those most concerned.

3. The "Objects and Reasons" of the Bill are stated to be solely the removal from the Code of Criminal Procedure of anomalous distinction and all judicial qualifications arising from merely race distinctions. It appears to me that an uniformity of the kind aimed at is not desirable, but that rather, as far as possible, special provisions should secure to distinct races the opportunity of being tried by those of their own race. The principle of the Bill is, in my view, the opposite of what it should be.

4. I consider that the principle followed in the existing procedure, of allowing European British subjects to be tried only by those of their own race, should not be departed from, unless it is shown to produce public inconvenience or injustice.

5. As regards the question of administrative inconvenience arising in the present or future from the exclusion of Native Covenanted Civilians from the power of trying European British subjects on criminal charges, I can reply, as regards the district now in my charge, that there is at present no Native Covenanted Civilian in it; but if hereafter one should be placed in charge of the district, not having the power to try Europeans, I feel confident that no substantial inconvenience will arise, since the district is connected directly by railway with other districts, in one or other of which there will always be a Justice of the Peace to whom any European may be sent for trial, or who may come to this place for the purpose.

6. I think that some slight alteration might be made, authorising the intermediate detention of an European British subject in the jail of the district of the Magistrate who issues the warrant; but, excepting any such alteration, I would deprecate any change in the existing procedure.

Dated 26th April 1883.

From—BARU RAM SUNKER SEN, Deputy Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs,
To—The Commissioner of the Presidency Division.

With reference to your memorandum No 11JJ., dated the 2nd April last, I have the honour to submit in brief my views on the Native Jurisdiction Bill.

First as to the principle of the Bill.

I think that, in introducing the present Bill, the Legislature proposes partially to carry out the broad principles laid down in the various Acts of Parliament as noted in the margin, enunciating the fact that "fitness was henceforth to be the criterion of eligibility" to the public service, and that distinctions of race and creed were to be ignored. As a result of this policy, several Natives of India, trained under the system of high education introduced in the country in the reign of Lord William Bentinck, which was improved upon under the

(a) 3 and 4 William IV, clause 85, section 87.

(b) Parliamentary Discussions in 1853, for throwing appointments in the Civil Service to open competition.

(c) 21 and 22 Victoria, clause 106, section 32.

(d) Her Majesty's Proclamation issued in 1858.

Great Education Despatch of 1854, secured for themselves appointments in the Covenanted Civil Service, in open competition in England; and it is with a view to invest these gentlemen with the powers which, under the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872, re-enacted in 1882, they cannot at present exercise over European British subjects in the mofussil, that the present Bill has been mainly brought. The legal disqualification under which they at present labour has been regarded by the educated portion of my countrymen as opposed to the declared policy of the Imperial Legislature, and the removal of the ban will tend to prove that the Indian Government is no longer willing that it should continue in the statute-book. The fitness of the Native Covenanted Civil Servants being admitted, there is no reason why, as District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, they should not be allowed to try European British subjects, while in the subordinate posts they will share that privilege in common with their European compeers, when they have attained the requisite experience.

I cannot, however, speak with the same confidence regarding the Native Civil Servants appointed under the Statutory Rules, as, from the system of nomination at present in vogue, I do not feel convinced that most of them possess the necessary qualifications to exercise the powers which the Bill proposes to invest them with.
